CORPUS JURIS

BEING

A COMPLETE AND SYSTEMATIC STATEMENT OF
THE WHOLE BODY OF THE LAW

AS EMBODIED IN AND DEVELOPED BY

ALL REPORTED DECISIONS

EDITED BY

WILLIAM MACK, LL.D.

Editor-in-Chief of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure

AND

DONALD J. KISER, LL.D.

Contributing Editor of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure

The law is progressive and expansive, adapting itself to the new relations and interests which are constantly springing up in the progress of society. But this progress must be by analogy to what is already settled.

I. DEFINITIONS

[By Chas. W. Riley]

[§ 1] Patent rights are those rights or privileges which governments grant to inventors with reference to their inventions.[1] The term "patent" is commonly used to designate either the instrument by which patent rights are evidenced,[2] or the patent right itself.[3] Using the term in the latter sense, a patent granted by the United States may be defined as a grant to an inventor, his heirs or assigns, of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend his invention for a definite period of time.[4]

II. COMMON-LAW RIGHTS

[By Chas. W. Riley]

[§ 2] An inventor has a natural right separate from, and independent of, any patent grant to make, use, and vend his invention,[6] and to deprive the public of the benefits of his invention by keeping it a secret.[7] But the making of an invention or discovery does not of itself confer upon the inventor or discoverer any exclusive right with respect to the production, use, or sale of his invention.[8] Such rights can be acquired only by grant of a sovereign authority.[9] Subject to the right of the inventor to be protected against disclosure or use by one who obtained knowledge through fraud or breach of faith,[10] the public has a natural right at common law to make, use, and sell anything of which it has sufficient knowledge,[11] and the exclusive right of an inventor in his invention is not recognized.[12]

III. STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

[By Chas. W. Riley]

[§ 3] A. In General. In the United States, congress is empowered by the constitution "to promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries."[13] The power conferred by the constitution upon congress to secure to inventors the exclusive right to their inventions is general,[14] and is subject to but one limitation, namely, that the period during which the privilege may be enjoyed shall be for a limited time.[15] Congress may exercise the power or refrain from so doing,[16] and it is within the discretion of that body to say when, for what length of time, and under what circumstances a patent for an invention shall be granted.[17] Congress may confer the patent privilege either by special grant to individuals,[18] or by general acts providing for the issue of grants to any person coming within their terms.[19] Except where vested rights are impaired,[20] it may exercise its power by retrothe useful arts, and as matter of compensation to the inventors for their labor, toil, and expense in making the inventions, and reducing the same to practice for the public benefit, as contemplated by the Constitution and sanctioned by the laws of Congress." Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 516, 533, 20 L. ed. 33.

spective action,[21] as where an invention is already in public use.[22] Congress cannot, however, take away the right of a party to use an article previously purchased by him.[23]

State grants. The federal constitution does not in terms prohibit the several states from exercising the power to grant patents to inventors,[24] or grant the power exclusively to the United States,[25] and, while no state can interfere with the exercise of the power granted to congress,[26] the grant of a patent by a state is not repugnant to the power granted to congress,[27] although, of course, the operation of the grant would be confined to the limits of the state granting the privilege.[28]

[§ 4] B. Federal Statutes. The first patent law enacted by congress pursuant to the power conferred by the constitution was that of April 10, 1790,[29] which was supplemented and extended by the act of February 21, 1793,[30] the act of April 17, 1800,[31] and the act of February 15, 1819.[32] Subsequent complete revisions were the patent acts of July 4, 1836,[33] and of July 8, 1870.[34] The latter act was confirmed and reënacted in the revision of 1874,[35] and, with its amendments,[36] is the present law.[37] In addition to these general laws, congress has from time to time granted patents to individuals by special act.[38] Special acts are considered as engrafted on the general act,[39] and are construed with the provisions of the general patent law.[40]

Purpose of patent acts. The purpose of congress in granting and authorizing the grant of patents is to stimulate inventors,[41] and to encourage the disclosure of inventions and discoveries to the public,[42] seeking thereby the object for which the power was conferred, namely, the promotion of the progress of science and useful arts.[43]

[§ 5] C. Extent of Operation. The monopoly of a patent does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the government granting it.[44] Subject to this limitation the rights conferred extend to all territory covered by the grant.[45] The monopoly conferred by the present patent law of the United States extends throughout the United States, and the territories thereof,[46] and the rights of the patentee are not operative beyond those limits.[47] While the rights extend to American vessels on the high seas,[48] they do not extend to foreign vessels in our ports.[49] In accord with the general rule that the constitution and the laws of the United States do not of their own inherent force pass to, and become operative in, territory belonging to the United States and subject to its jurisdiction,[50] the patent rights conferred thereby do not extend to such territory in the absence of action by congress.[51]

IV. NATURE AND EXTENT OF RIGHT CONFERRED

[By Chas. W. Riley]

[§ 6] A. In General. The granting of patent rights is an act of sovereignty,[52] and how the sovereign authority of a country shall speak depends upon the constitution and settled scheme of government in that country,[53] as does also the nature and extent of the rights granted to the inventor.[54] In the United States, the nature and extent of a patent right are entirely dependent upon the provisions of the acts of congress providing for and regulating such grants.[55] The present law authorizes the granting to inventors, their heirs and assigns, of an exclusive privilege to "make, use, and vend" their inventions for a definite period of time.[56] The right granted consists in a limited monopoly for the benefit of the public with reference to the production, use, and sale of the invention.[57]

Patent right an exclusionary right merely. The grant of a patent does not create in the patentee the right to make, use, and vend the thing patented;[58] that right he possesses at common law without special authority from the government.[59] The right granted is only a negative right of exclusion.[60] A patentee is merely given for a limited time the right to exclude others having knowledge of the invention from making, using, or selling it.[61]

[§ 7] B. Patent as a Contract. Courts have regarded a patent as a contract between the inventor and the government.[62] The instrument containing

(2) The Danish Patent Act of 1894 changed the procedure and the method of granting an "eneret" or patent, although under this act the extent of the monopoly is about the same as it was according to custom and usage under the royal grants. the grant of a patent right evidences such a contract.[63] This contract consists of mutual, interrelated considerations moving from each party to the other for such contract.[64] The consideration given on the part of the patentee is the disclosure of the invention.[65] The consideration on the part of the government is the grant of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention throughout the United States, and the territories thereof, for a definite period of time.[66]

[§ 8] C. Patent Right as Property.[67] A patent gives the patentee title to an intangible, incorporeal right,[68] in the nature of a privilege or franchise,[69] a title which continues to exist until divested by a voluntary grant or other legal means of divestment.[70] The right granted is property[71]—property of the patentee[72]—which, in so far as its incorporeal nature permits, is subject to the general laws relating to such property,[73] and is surrounded by the same rights and sanctions which attend all other property.[74]

Situs. The right or privilege, however, is personal to the owner thereof,[75] has no situs separate from the individual holding it,[76] and can be reached by the courts only by securing jurisdiction of him.[77] In the United States, a patent right has no definite situs within the territorial jurisdiction of any state court but is coexistent in every state.[78]

V. PATENTABILITY[79]

[By CHAS. W. RILEY]

[§ 9] A. In General. Since the grant of a patent is purely a statutory creation,[80] a patent may be obtained and enjoyed only in respect of subject matter specified by congress.[81] Congress has provided that a patent may be obtained, under and subject to certain exceptions and conditions, by any person who has discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, not known or used by others in this country before his invention or discovery thereof, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof.[82] A patent can be obtained, therefore, only for an art or instrument falling within the enumerated classes or divisions and possessing the attributes of invention, novelty, and utility.[83]

[§ 10] B. Classes of Patentable Subject Matter—1. In General. Under the present patent laws in the United States, the classes of patentable subject matter include "any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvements thereof,"[84] and "any new, original, and ornamental design for an article of manufacture."[85] The classification of mechanical patentable subject matter has been adhered to by congress continuously since 1793,[86] and the division or classification so made has been recognized as constitutional.[87] Unless the subject matter of a discovery or invention falls within one or the other of the divisions enumerated or described by the statute, no patent may be obtained.[88]

[§ 11] 2. Art or Process—a. In General. One of the divisions of patentable subject matter specifically enumerated or described in the statute is that of any new and useful "art."[89] A new and useful art or process[90] is just as patentable as a machine, manufacture, or any other of the statutory classes of patentable subject matter.[91]

[§ 12] b. Definitions and Distinctions. An art or

"Three elements are essential to constitute a valid and effective patent, viz.: (1) Creation, by the exercise not merely of mechanical skill, but of the inventive faculties, or, in the language of Mr. Justice Matthews, 'that intuitive faculty of the mind, put forth in search for new results or new methods, creating what had not before existed, or bringing to light what lay hidden from vision' (Hollister v. Benedict, etc., Mfg. Co., 113 U. S. 59, 72, 5 SCt 717, 28 L. ed. 901); (2) the result must be so distinct an advance in the prior art, machine, or process as to have the feature of novelty, accomplishing by a new method, through the substitution or addition of a new whole, a new part or parts, or through the combination of old parts in a new way, a similar effect in a new and different way; and (3) the thing or process must be of utility—that is to say, practicable and capable of performing its specified functions to produce an advantageous or useful result." process has been defined as an act, or mode of acting;[92] a mode of treatment of certain materials to produce a given result;[93] an act, or series of acts, performed upon the subject matter to be transformed and reduced to a different state or thing;[94] a connected series of steps or operations for accomplishing a physical result;[95] an operation done by rule to secure a result;[96] the application or operation of some element or power of nature, or of one subject to another;[97] a definite combination of new or old elements, ingredients, operations, ways, or means to produce a result;[98] the subjection of a specific object to the influence of a specific force through a specific mode of application.[99] That certain things should be done with certain substances, and in a certain way is said to be required.[1] It has also been said that an art or process must consist of a series of steps or sequence of operations,[2] and that this is so, even though the operation is continuous and leads to a single result.[3] An art or process is not a machine,[4] a thing,[5] or a result,[6] but simply a method of doing things.[7] It is a conception of the mind, seen only by its effects when being executed or performed.[8] In patent law the term "art" has a different and more restricted meaning than it has in ordinary usage.[9] It is used in the sense of the employment of means to a desired end; the adaptation of powers in the natural world to the uses of life.[10] It has reference to the steps followed or successive acts performed in producing some desired physical effect.[11] Any method or means of producing a physical result which is independent of particular mechanism or mechanical combination for producing it may be patented as an art or process.[12] It is im-

"So, where any judge speaks of patenting an art, it is not an art in the abstract, without a specification of the manner in which it is to operate, as a manufacture or otherwise. But it is the art thus explained in the specification, and illustrated by a machine, or model, or drawings, when of a character to be. It is the art so represented or exemplified, like the principle thus embodied, which alone the patent laws ever are designed to protect." Smith v. Downing, supra.

"If one of the steps of a process be that a certain substance is to be reduced to a powder, it may not be at material whether the result is produced by chemical agency or combination;[13] or by the application of discoveries or principles in natural philosophy;[14] or by machinery acting altogether on mechanical principles.[15]

The mere function or effect of an operation or instrument is not an art or process.[16]

"Art" and "process" used as synonyms. The word "process" is not used in the statute,[17] but, while an art may require several processes to produce a given result,[18] the term "process" has been brought into the decisions, and used in the language of the patent law, as an equivalent form of expression of the statutory term "art."[19]

[§ 13] c. Physical Result Essential. An art or process is not a mere abstraction.[20] An art or process includes only such operations as are capable of producing a tangible product or of accomplishing a change in the character or quality of some material object.[21] The physical result, however, need not be a permanent condition of the article or substance acted upon, but may be temporary, as in the case of transmitting speech by certain regulated undulations of the electric current in the telephone.[22] It is not essential that a change in the chemical substance of the subject matter be accomplished;[23] a new product may be created merely from the mechanical readjustments,[24] or a new juxtaposition of parts.[25]

Mental theories, ideas, or plans of action. A mere mental theory, idea, or plan of action is not an art or process.[26]

[§ 14] d. Process and Instrumentalities of Process Distinguished. A process and the instrumentalities employed in its exercise are distinct things.[27] Patentability may exist as to either, neither, or all material what instrument or machinery is used to effect that object, whether a hammer, a pestle and mortar, or a mill." Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780, 787, 24 L. ed. 139.

"A valid patent cannot be obtained for a process which involves nothing more than the operation of a piece of mechanism, or, in other words, for the function of a machine." Risdon Iron, etc., Works v. Medart, 158 U. S. 68, 77, 15 SCt 745, 39 L. ed. 899.

[a] "The term process is often used in a more vague sense, in which it cannot be the subject of a patent. Thus we say that a board is undergoing the process of being planed, grain of being ground, iron of being hammered, or rolled. Here the term is used subjectively or passively as applied to the material operated on, and not to the method or mode of producing that operation, which is by mechanical means, or the use of a machine, as distinguished from a process. In this use of the term it represents the function of a machine, or the effect produced by it on the material subjected to the action of the machine." Corning v. Burden, 15 How. (U. S.) 252, 268, 14 L. ed. 683.

[b] Illustrations.—(1) The liberation or expansion of steam into radiating pipes at a rate controlled by the expansion of a thermostatic device under the heat of discharging steam is the mere function of the thermostat and the valve operated by it, and such operations are not patentable as a process. (2) In a system or process for storing power, involving the use of tanks or reservoirs, the locating of the lower reservoirs in a deep pit adds nothing to the patentability of the invention, that being merely a structural, and not a process, idea. In re Fessenden, 45 App. (D. C.) 21. (3) The placing of a debit and credit sheet in such a position that the debit and credit entry can be made at the same time by a single operating device does not constitute an inventive idea so as to entitle a person conceiving the idea to a process patent, as distinct from a patent for a machine for achieving such a result. [b] An architectural plan for the building of a house is not an art or process. Jacobs v. Baker, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 295, 19 L. ed. 200.

[c] Form of contract.—A form of proposed contract to be entered into with individuals desiring the benefit of burial insurance or guaranty, with blanks, attached and readily separable therefrom, which, in addition to the ordinary draft for payment, show the several certificates required in order to provide, as far as practicable, against the perpetration of frauds on insurer or the guarantor, is not patentable as an art. In re Moeser, 27 App. (D. C.) 307.

27. Leeds v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 213 U. S. 301, 29 SCt 495, 53 L. ed. 805; Risdon Iron, etc., Works v. Medart, 158 U. S. 68, 15 SCt 745, 39

both.[28] The fact that a process cannot be used without the apparatus, or the apparatus without the process, does not make them the same invention.[29] However, an art or process and a machine or apparatus may be so connected in their design and operation as to constitute unitary invention.[30]

[§ 15] e. Mechanical Processes. The mere fact that the use of machinery may be necessary in carrying out the process does not render it unpatentable.[31] In some of the earlier decisions it was apparently assumed, although not actually decided, that a process, in order to be the subject of the patent, must involve chemical or other similar elemental action.[32] But it is now well settled that a process is not rendered unpatentable by the mere fact that it consists of mechanical operations and does not involve chemical or other similar elemental action.[33] Operations which consist entirely of mechanical transactions, but which may be performed by hand or by any of the several mechanisms or machines, other than those exhibited, may be patented as an art or process,[34] even though they may not be so performed with equal efficiency.[35]

[§ 16] f. Processes Involving Chemical or Elemental Action. Processes producing their results by chemical action, by the operation or application of some element or power of nature, or of some property in matter, are included within the subject matter described or designated by the statutory term "art."[36] A process may consist in the mixing of certain substances together,[37] or in the heating of a substance to a certain temperature.[38]

[§ 17] 3. Machines. Machines constitute another of the divisions or classes of patentable subject matter specifically enumerated or described by the statute.[39] A "machine" has been defined as an instrument composed of one or more of the mechanical powers, and capable, when set in motion, of producing, by its own operation, certain predetermined physical effects.[40] A "machine" has also been defined as a definite combination of definite elements to accomplish a given result.[41] The term "machine" includes every mechanical device or combination of devices to perform some function and produce a certain effect or result.[42] New combinations as well as new organizations of mechanism are included in the term.[43] A machine is not a mere principle or idea,[44] but a concrete thing consisting of parts, or of certain devices or combinations of devices.[45] It is said that a machine differs from all other mechanical instruments in that its rule of action resides within itself.[46] However, it has been held that a machine need not be automatic;[47] and that the term "machine" may include devices which are incapable of use except in connection with other mechanisms.[48]

The "principle of a machine" is defined as its mode of operation,[49] or that peculiar combination of devices which distinguishes it from other machines.[50] The term "machine" does not include the principle of a machine.[51] While the principle of a machine and its mode of operation are required to be set forth in the specifications,[52] no patent as for a machine can be obtained therefor.[53]

The function of a machine is that power or property of the machine of acting in the specific manner designed or intended by its construction;[54] that which the machine is designed to do as distinguished from itself, and from the product of its action upon something external to itself.[55] A machine patent cannot be obtained for the mere function of a machine.[56]

[§ 18] 4. Manufactures.[57] Another division or class of patentable subject matter specifically enumerated or described by the statute is that of manufactures.[58] The primary meaning of the word "manufacture" is something made by hand as distinguished from a natural growth;[59] but as machinery has largely supplanted this primitive method, the word is now ordinarily used to denote anything made from raw materials by hand, by machinery, or by art.[60] As used in the statute, the term "manufacture" embraces whatever is made by the art or industry of man, not being a machine, a composition of matter, or a design.[61] A manufacture is distinguished from machines by not having any rule of action,[62] and from compositions of matter by not involving the relation of ingredients.[63] The term "manufacture" does not include natural products[64] or natural elements;[65] nor does it include a mere method of doing things.[66] The function of a method or device is not included in the term "manufacture."[67] A manufacture is distinct from the method or device by which it is produced.[68] Either or both may be patentable.[69]

Building structures. Although the supreme court has employed language indicating that building structures are not included within the statutory term "manufacture,"[70] it has been asserted that it did not expressly so decide,[71] and it now seems settled that building structures are "manufactures" within the meaning of the patent law.[72] Thus it has been held that the term "manufacture" may embrace a roof structure by which light and ventilation are secured;[73] a concrete arch of a bridge in combination with abutments;[74] a sarcophagus monument;[75] an improvement in mausoleum construction;[76] an improvement in steel skeleton concrete construction;[77] or various parts of a railroad car.[78] A mere form of construction, however, is not patentable as a manufacture.[79]

[§ 19] 5. Compositions of Matter. Compositions of matter constitute another of the classes or divisions of patentable subject matter specifically enumerated or described by the statute,[80] and the inventor of a new and useful composition of matter has the same right to a patent as the inventor of any new and useful art, machine, or manufacture.[81] A composition of matter is a compound produced or resulting from the intermixture of two or more specific ingredients and possessing properties different from, or in addition to, those possessed by the several ingredients in common.[82] Except that novelty, utility, and invention are required,[83] there is no restriction as to the nature of the composition which may be patented.[84] Such compounds may be patentable irrespective of whether they are produced by mechanical[85] or chemical[86] operations, or both.[87] A composition of matter is distinct from the method by which it is produced.[88] Either or both may be patentable.[89]

[§ 20] 6. Improvements. An "improvement" is an addition to, or change in, a known art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter which produces a useful result.[90] A change in an old art or

"A machine may be new, and the product or manufacture proceeding from it may be old. In that case the former would be patentable and the latter not. The machine may be substantially old and the product new. In that event the latter, and not the former, would be patentable. Both may be new, or both may be old. In the former case, both would be patentable; in the latter neither." Providence Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, supra.

"We think these cases not decisive. In Jacobs v. Baker, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 295, 19 L. ed. 200, Justice Grier, who wrote the opinion, was inclined to the view that an improvement in the plan of constructing a jail was not within the patent statute. The point, however, was not expressly decided; the bill being dismissed on the ground that the patentee was not the first inventor. In the May Case, Jacobs v. Baker was said to have held that: 'An improvement in the construction of a jail did not come under the denomination of a machine, or a manufacture, or a composition of matter; and that it was doubtful whether it could be classed as an art.' But this proposition was passed without reaffirming it, and the case apparently decided upon another ground." International Mausoleum Co. v. Sievert, supra.

[a] Rule accords with patent office construction.—It seems that the patent office has construed the word "manufacture" to cover buildings, and has issued large numbers of patents accordingly. Thus, class No. 20 of the patent office covers wooden buildings, and under modern development has been extended to include steel framed structures, and includes ninety-seven different subclasses, under which patents are issued for doors, windows, floors, supporting columns, wall construction, and other parts of buildings. Roofs form a separate class, No. 108, and under this head we find numerous subclasses of roofs, under the various subheads of adjustable, fabric lined, metal lined, composite, fireproof, lap joints, shingle, observatory domes, portable, skylight, slate, trusses, etc. Riter-Conley Mfg. instrument may consist alone of a new and useful combination of the several parts of which it is composed,[91] or it may consist of a material alteration or modification of one or more of the several devices which enter into its construction,[92] or it may consist in adding new devices.[93] An "improvement" has essential reference to a subject matter to be improved.[94] It is not original, but embraces and either adds to or alters the original.[95] An invention is an independent invention and not a mere "improvement" of an original invention if its essential characteristics are different,[96] or if the idea of means in which it consists cannot be applied to the original without destroying the identity of the latter.[97] An "improvement" on a patent or invention, if it possesses the usual requirements of patentability, is patentable.[98] The improvement may be upon the patentee's own invention.[99] The right to a patent is, of course, limited to the improvement, and does not include the art, machine, or article improved.[1]

[§ 21] 7. Designs. Designs constitute another of the classes or divisions of patentable subject matter specifically enumerated or described by congress.[2] A "design," in the view of the patent law, is that characteristic of a physical substance which, by means of lines, images, configuration and the like, taken as a whole, make an impression, through the eye, upon the mind of the observer, with respect to the thing observed, of uniqueness and character.[3] In other words, it is that which gives a peculiar or distinctive appearance to the article to which it may be applied, or to which it may give form.[4] Appearance is the essential consideration.[5] As used in the acts of congress, the term embraces only designs applied,[6] or to be applied,[7] to an article of manufacture. A mere abstract impression or picture is not a design such as the law has in view.[8] No patent can be had for a design which in itself is incapable of reproduction.[9] The characteristic feature of a design may reside in the symmetry and proportion of the manufacture,[10] or in its decorative design,[11] or in the combination of the two.[12] In other words the impression produced may be the result of peculiarity of configuration,[13] or of ornament alone,[14] or of both conjointly.[15] The essence of a design resides in the appearance of the design as a whole,[16] not in the elements individually,[17] or in their method of arrangement.[18] A design may include movable parts.[19]

Design patents and other patents distinguished. A design patent relates to different subject matter than other patents.[20] The appearance of an article is the subject matter dealt with rather than its structure, uses, or functions.[21] The fact that a design is for a patentable mechanical device does not disqualify it from the protection of a patent for a design.[22]

[§ 22] 8. Effect or Result Accomplished by a Method or Device. Patentable subject matter does include a mere effect, end, or result to be accomplished by a method or device.[23] It is for the discovery or invention of some practicable method or means of producing a beneficial result or effect that a patent is granted, and not the result itself.[24] Anyone is free to devise a new method to accomplish the same effect or result.[25]

[§ 23] 9. Function of Method or Device. The mere function of a method or device is not patentable.[26] Patentable subject matter as defined by the statute is confined to the idea of means embodied in the art or instrument by which the function is performed.[27] Anyone is free to devise new means capable of realizing the same functions.[28]

[§ 24] 10. Principle or Law of Nature. An idea of means whereby a principle or law of nature is utilized to effect a practical result may be the subject of a patent[29] whether it is by chemical agency or combination, or by utilizing principles of natural philosophy or mechanics,[30] but no patent can be obtained for the discovery of an abstract principle,[31] or what is sometimes called a "law of nature."[32] A principle in the abstract is a fundamental truth; an original cause; a motive; these cannot be patented, because no one can claim in any of them an exclusive right.[33] Nor can an exclusive right exist to a new power, should one be discovered in addition to those already known.[34] The elements of the power exist; invention is not in discovering them, but in applying them to useful objects.[35] The principle or law of nature must be embodied in some practical mode of carrying the principle or law of nature into effect.[36]

Action. While the means by which an idea may be made practically useful may be the subject of a patent,[37] an idea, of itself, is not patentable.[38] The mere existence of an intellectual notion that a certain thing could be done, and, if done, might be of practical utility, does not furnish a basis for a patent.[39] Mere mental theories[40] or plans of action[41] are not comprehended within the subject matter described by congress.

[§ 26] C. Novelty and Anticipation[42]—1. In General. Congress has provided for the granting of patents to inventors or discoverers of any "new" and useful art or instrument "not known or used by others in this country, before his invention or discovery thereof, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, before his invention or discovery thereof."[43] And, to be patentable, an invention must be "new."[44] This is equally the case whether the invention consists of an entire machine or improvement of a machine, or a combination of several mechanical powers.[45] Absolute novelty is not required.[46] The term "new" is explained or limited by the words subsequently used in the statute.[47] An invention is "new," within the meaning of the statute, if it was not known or used in this country prior to the inventor's invention or discovery thereof, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof.[48] If the invention lacks "novelty," as so defined, it is said to be anticipated.[49]

[§ 27] 2. Anticipatory Methods or Devices[50]—a. In General. "Anticipation" means the disclosure in the prior art of a thing substantially identical with the art or instrument for which a patent is sought.[51] An invention is anticipated only if the invention already known or used by others in this country, or patented or described in a printed publication in this or any foreign country, is identical in substance with it.[52] The complete and operative invention must substantially different results,[58] or perform different functions,[59] or if they perform the same function in a different way.[60] The two inventions need not be identical in form or structure.[61] A mere colorable variation will not confer novelty.[62] It is sufficient if the difference is only such as would suggest itself to any person skilled in the art to which the later invention relates.[63] Identity need extend no further than to matter claimed.[64] And mere superiority of the invention for which a patent is sought does not prevent anticipation.[65]

Infringe if later test. Speaking generally, that which would infringe a patent, if later, will anticipate, if earlier.[66] What would not infringe cannot anticipate.[67]

[§ 28] b. Processes. Generally speaking, a process can only be anticipated by a similar process.[68] It is not necessary, however, that the two processes should be identical in all particulars.[69] It is sufficient if in general aspects they are the same, and the difference in minor matters is only such as would suggest itself to a person possessing ordinary skill in the art.[70] It is not necessary that the thing produced shall be new.[71] A process may be anticipated by a machine which fully discloses the process.[72] But the mechanical means by which the result is attained may be old provided the result has not been attained by such means before.[73] To anticipate a process patent, it is necessary, not only to show that the prior patent might have been used to carry out the process, but that such use was contemplated, or that it would have occurred to an ordinary mechanic operating the device.[74]

[a] Reason for rule.—"The mere possession of an instrument or piece of mechanism contains no suggestion whatever of all the possible processes to which it may be adapted. New Process Fermentation Co. v. Maus, 122 U. S. 413, 428, 7 SCt 1304, 30 L. ed. 1103. If the mere fact that a prior device might be made effective merely because the method or device by which it is produced is old.[75] Nor is a product new merely because made by a new process or machine.[76] The method or device may be new, and the product proceeding from it may be old. In that case, the former may be patentable, and the latter not.[77] The method or device may be old and the product new. In that event the latter and not the former would be patentable.[78] Both may be new or both may be old. In the former case both would be patentable, and in the latter neither.[79]

[§ 30] d. Combinations.[80] A combination is identical in substance with what is already known or used, patented, or described in a printed publication, if it consists of the same elements, or their mechanical equivalents, combined in substantially the same way to produce substantially the same result.[81] The mere fact that the various elements of a combination are old will not anticipate a claim to the combination.[82] To find in the prior art each element in isolation is not to anticipate the work of an inventor who first evolves a new combination of those elements which by their conjoined functions produce a new result.[83] It is indispensable that all of them, or their mechanical equivalents, be found in the same description, method, or device, where they have been combined in substantially the same way to produce substantially the same result as that accomplished by the combination of the invention.[84] A combination of all the elements but one will not anticipate.[85]

[§ 31] e. Inoperative Methods or Devices. An art or instrument is not effective as an anticipation if it is wholly incapable of performing the function of the later invention,[86] or if change or modification, reorganization, or combination, involving the exer-

for the carrying on of a particular process were sufficient to anticipate such process, the absurd result would follow that, if the process consisted merely of manipulation, it would be anticipated by the mere possession of a pair of hands." "Where the thing patented is an entirety, consisting of a single device or combination of old elements incapable of division or separate use, the respondent cannot escape the charge of infringement by alleging or proving that a part of the entire invention is found in one prior patent, printed publication, or machine, and another part in another prior exhibit, and still another part in a third exhibit, and from the three or any greater number of such exhibits draw the conclusion that the patentee is not the original and first inventor of the patented improvement." Imhaeuser v. Buerk, 101 U. S. 647, 660, 25 L. ed. 945.

[a] Reason for rule.—"Common justice forbids such a defence, as it would work a virtual repeal of so much of the Patent Act as gives to inventors the right to a patent consisting of old elements, where the combination itself is new and produces a new and useful result." "It is no defense to a claim of an infringement that one or more elements of a patented combination, or one or more parts of a patented improvement, may be found in one old patent or publication, and others in another, and still others in a third. It is indispensable that all of them, or their mechanical equivalents, be found in the same description or machine, where they do the same work by substantially the same means." J. L. Owens Co. v. [§ 32] f. Methods or Devices Used for Other Purposes.[90] An art or instrument used for one purpose may be effective as an anticipation of an invention consisting of the use of a substantially identical art or instrument for another purpose if the new use be so nearly analogous to the former one that the applicability of the means to its new use would be obvious to persons skilled in the art to which the invention relates.[91] That the new use was not before contemplated is immaterial.[92] But it is otherwise if the relations between the old use and the new be so remote that persons skilled in the art would not understand, without the benefit of the teaching of the later invention, that the function performed by it could be accomplished by the means employed,[93] or by means requiring but slight changes or modifications, not involving invention, to be ren-

In re Pratt, 44 App. (D. C.) 462. (2) Claims for a porcelain outlet box for electric wires, with slightly raised portions around the screw holes, so that the cover touches at such points only, and intended to prevent the cover from being broken by transverse strains caused by unevenness in the surface of the box, are anticipated by a patent covering the same idea, except that in it the raised portions are around each screw hole on the cover instead of on the box. In re Havens, 39 App. (D. C.) 465. (3) An alleged improvement in bottle caps, consisting of a metallic cap having a projection of a length substantially equal to the height of the cap depending from the side thereof and used to facilitate removal of the cap, is anticipated by prior patents in which the same elements are disclosed, but having longer projections, used, however, in the same way to accomplish the same result. In re Cake, 39 App. (D. C.) 425. (4) A product claim for a stock food in a comminuted form, incorporating all the nutritious parts of a food plant which can be conveniently harvested, is not patentable, being anticipated by an Austrian patent disclosing a cattle food consisting of an entire plant, comminuted and dried. In re French, 39 App. (D. C.) 413. (5) A claim for the combination of means in a linotype machine to sustain "a magazine in operative position upon the machine, and storage means for an idle magazine directly above the machine, whereby the positions of the operative magazine and the idle magazine may be interchanged by the operator without necessitating his leaving the machine," is anticipated by a patent in which the same elements are disclosed, but the storage device is located at one side of, instead of above, the main frame of the machine. [a] Illustrations.—(1) Claims in an application for a patent for a combination in a bed couch are anticipated by a patent wherein the same structure is found except that the projections to the end of the seat extend from the upper instead of the lower side thereof, and project just beyond the back, instead of to a point just within the box, although so changing the seat projections may give a better balance to the box and seat. In re Hoey, 28 App. (D. C.) 416. (2) An applicant for a patent for a process for the hardening of cast iron by adding to the molten metal on its way to the mold a powdered material, by means of a specific machine or device also invented by applicant, and for which he has filed a separate application for a patent, is anticipated by a patent for a similar process, but which does not cover any means to make the mixture, as applicant merely secures a better result from the use of the old process, by means of his mechanical device. In re Wright, 34 App. (D. C.) 199.

In re Birkigt, 48 App. (D. C.) 378. (2) Claims for a can of sheet iron or steel coated with a suitable lacquer or enamel, the composition of which is not specified, to form a tight connection for the lock joints, are anticipated by a patent for a tin plate can coated with aluminum lining applied over a coat of size or varnish, intended to accomplish the same result. In re Russell, 36 App. (D. C.) 444. (3) An advertising device used in connection with a telephone, and automatically operated by the removal of the receiver from its hook, is anticipated by a similar device in connection with a cigar lighter, and operated in the same way by the lifting of the lighter from its hook, and by a device for utilizing in a different way a telephone for the display of advertisements. "While it is possible that the Stringfellow and Surles patent might, by a slight modification, be made to perform the function of equalizing the springs which it was the object of the Augur patent to secure, that was evidently not in the mind of the patentees, and the patent is inoperative for that purpose. Their device evidently approached very near the idea of an equalizer; but this idea did not apparently dawn upon them, nor was there anything in their patent which would have suggested it to a mechanic of ordinary intelligence, unless he were examining it for that purpose. It is not sufficient to constitute an anticipation that the device relied upon might, by modification, be made to accomplish the function performed by the patent in question, if it were not designed by its maker, nor adapted, nor actually used, for the performance of such functions." ventions.[97] It is immaterial that the earlier invention was not the subject of a patent,[98] or of description in any printed publication.[99] The mere fact that the inventor was ignorant of the anticipatory matter is likewise immaterial.[1] It is not essential in order to anticipate an invention that there be both prior knowledge and prior use; prior knowledge alone is sufficient.[2] However, "knowledge or use," as those words are used in the statute, means knowledge or use accessible to the public.[3] Actual knowledge or use is insufficient as an anticipation unless and until the public acquires, or has opportunity to acquire therefrom, such knowledge as would enable one skilled in the art to which the invention relates to practice it without exercising further invention of his own.[4] The earlier invention must have been complete[5] and capable of performing the function performed by the subsequent invention.[6] The mere mental conception of the desirability of doing a thing, and of the means of doing it, will not suffice.[7] An invention is not anticipated by mere surmises,[8] theories,[9] suggestions,[10] or speculations as to what might be done.[11] Before an invention can be anticipated by prior knowledge or use, the complete operative invention must have been reduced to practice.[12]

Necessity of actual construction or use. The requirement of previous reduction to practice is satisfied if the invention has been so far completed as to remove it from the state of mere theory.[13] Actual construction, embodiment, or use of the prior method or thing is not necessary if its discovery has been so manifested publicly that one skilled in the particular art would be able to reproduce it.[14] Ordinarily, however, the invention must have been tested and found satisfactory,[15] although some devices are so simple that no test is necessary to demonstrate their success.[16] It has been asserted that if the identity of the alleged anticipation with the invention can only be known by actual use, actual use is necessary;[17] but if the identity is apparent on inspection, it is not.[18] Commercial use is not necessary.[19]

[§ 34] b. Extent of Knowledge or Use. Subject to the rules applicable in the case of concealed inventions,[20] the extent of prior knowledge or use is immaterial.[21] An invention is anticipated if it was known or used by some members of the public in this country,[22] and knowledge by a single member of the public is sufficient.[23] In order that an invention may be anticipated, it is not necessary that the earlier invention be known or used generally.[24] An invention is not anticipated by knowledge or use by the inventor which he does not disclose to others.[25]

Knowledge or use by a joint inventor is knowledge or use by others.[26]

[§ 35] c. Knowledge or Use Abroad. Under the first patent statute a "new" invention, as described by congress, was one "not before known or used,"[27] thus making it essential that the invention be new to all the world.[28] By force of subsequent enactments, knowledge or use of an unpatented and unthing of itself demonstrates that it is within the principle of the patent, then, perhaps, no use need be established, for it might be said to prove itself." "If the construction of the prior published invention in a foreign country was deprived of its anticipatory effect.[29] The present statute specifically provides that, whenever it appears that a patentee, at the time of making his application, believed himself to be the original and first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be held to be void on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof having been known or used in a foreign country, before his invention or discovery thereof, if it had not been patented or described in a printed publication.[30] By force of this provision, reduction to practice of the same idea of means in a foreign country does not operate as an anticipation of an invention made and reduced to practice here, however widely known such foreign reduction to practice may be, either among foreigners or among persons living here, if the invention is not patented or described in a printed publication.[31] If, however, an inventor has notice thereof, he cannot obtain a patent even though the invention or discovery had not been patented or described in any printed publication abroad.[32]

[§ 36] d. Knowledge or Use Subsequent to Date of Invention. The earliest patent act provided for the granting of patents for inventions "not before known or used."[33] No patent was authorized under that statute if the invention was known or used at any time prior to the application for a patent.[34] Under the present statute, however, the question of novelty is to be determined by the knowledge possessed by people in the United States at the time that the patentee makes the invention,[35] and not at the time that he secures his patent or files his application.[36] Prior knowledge or use sufficient to constitute anticipation is to be distinguished from the prior public use by which the right to a patent for an invention may be abandoned,[37] and, to anticipate, the earlier invention need not have been "known or used" more than two years before the patent date.[38]

[§ 37] e. Inoperative Methods or Devices. An invention is not anticipated by knowledge or use of an art or instrument wholly incapable of performing the same function,[39] or which is capable of performing the same function only when subjected to modifications or changes involving the exercise of further invention.[40] However, the fact that such a method or thing is incapable of producing the same result does not prevent it from anticipating the invention where such incapacity is curable without invention.[41] If the cause of its failure to work is obvious to a person skilled in the art, and remediable by the exercise of mere mechanical skill, it may nevertheless constitute anticipation.[42] The fact that the application of mere "mechanical skill" as distinguished from "inventive skill" is required in order that the earlier method or thing may perform the function of the later art or instrument with the same degree of perfection does not deprive it of its anticipatory effect.[43]

[§ 38] f. Accidental or Unintentional Productions. Anticipatory prior knowledge or use of an invention cannot arise from a prior accidental production of the same thing, when the operator does not recognize the means by which the accidental result is accomplished, and no knowledge of them, or of the method of their employment, is derived from the prior use by anyone until the date of the invention.[44] It has been held, however, that to constitute anticipation of a later patent it is enough that such a construction had been in well established use, whether it originated in design or by accident.[45] An invention may be anticipated by prior knowledge or use even though the scientific principle of its operation was not understood,[46] and even though all of its advantages were not appreciated.[47] It has also been held immaterial that the new form of result had not been before contemplated.[48]

experiment is successful.[50] Successful use of an art or instrument is not experimental use.[51] An invention or discovery is not to be considered an abandoned experiment merely because it was not applied to commercial use,[52] or because its use was abandoned.[53] Nor is an invention or discovery to be considered as an abandoned experiment merely because the earlier inventor did not apply for a patent for it.[54] On the other hand, the mere fact that an unsuccessful application for a patent was made does not give anticipatory effect to an abandoned experiment.[55]

[§ 40] h. Abandoned Inventions. An invention is anticipated by prior knowledge or use even though the earlier art or instrument may have been abandoned.[56]

[§ 41] i. Lost Arts. Prior knowledge or use will not negative novelty, if that use had ceased when the patent was granted, and that knowledge was forgotten until called to mind by a reinvention.[57] It is not necessary in order to deprive a method or thing of its anticipatory effect that it should have been buried and unknown for any particular length of time.[58] But it is essential that the knowledge should have completely disappeared.[59] It must at least have been so far forgotten that its inventor, if living, or others who may have witnessed its use, would not be able to recall it to memory and reproduce it without the assistance of the description of the subsequent invention.[60]

[§ 42] j. Secret Knowledge or Use. There is authority to the effect that a subsequent invention is not anticipated where the earlier inventor conceals or suppresses the fact of his knowledge or use until the subsequent invention is made.[61] Expressions of a contrary view appear in some of the decisions,[62] and it has been asserted that the rule, in any event, must be confined within narrow limits.[63] In order to come within this rule the first inventor must have determined to practice his invention secretly,[64] and his efforts to keep the invention secret must have been successful.[65] A use is not strictly secret where

[a] Reason for rule.—"It is well known that centuries ago discoveries were made in certain arts the fruits of which have come down to us, but the means by which the work was accomplished are at this day unknown. The knowledge has been lost for ages. Yet it would hardly be doubted, if any one now discovered an art thus lost, and it was a useful improvement, that, upon a fair construction of the act of Congress, he would be entitled to a patent. Yet he would not literally be the first and original inventor. But he would be the first to confer on the public the benefit of the invention. He would discover what is unknown, and communicate knowledge which the public had not the means of obtaining without his invention." Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. (U. S.) 477, 497, 13 L. ed. 504.

"I therefore understand the law on this subject to be that the mere secret practice of a process or the mere physical presence of a product or manufacture in this country is insufficient as an anticipation unless and until the public acquires, or has opportunity to acquire, therefrom such knowledge as would enable one skilled in the art to practice the invention." one or more persons are permitted to witness the anticipatory method or thing in operation without pledge of secrecy,[66] or even if they might have seen it had they used their opportunity.[67] The persons who witness the use of an anticipating method or thing need not understand or appreciate its method of operation[68] or be interested in practicing it.[69] Nor is it essential that they be skilled in the art to which the use appertained.[70] If an invention was actually used, such use is not deprived of its anticipatory effect by the fact that the thing embodying the invention was hidden from view.[71]

[§ 43] k. Disclosures of Prior Applications.[72] Subject to the exception which exists with reference to earlier applications of the same inventor,[73] an invention may be anticipated by disclosures contained in an earlier application for a United States patent.[74] The anticipatory effect of such a disclosure is not affected by the fact that the anticipatory matter was not made the basis of a claim,[75] or by the fact that the application was abandoned.[76] However, in order that an invention may be anticipated, the disclosures of the prior application must be such as would enable any person skilled in the art to practice the invention without exercising inventive skill of his own.[77]

[§ 44] 4. Prior Patents[78]—a. In General. No valid patent can be obtained by an inventor for his invention if it was patented in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof.[79]

It has been asserted that this is true regardless of whether the prior patent is valid or not.[80] Nor does the fact that a patent has been allowed to lapse for nonpayment of annual fees deprive it of anticipatory effect.[81] To give a prior patent effect as an anticipation it is not necessary that the invention patented should be generally known,[82] that its existence should have been known to the later inventor,[83] or that the art or instrument of the patent should be commercially successful.[84] The form in which a prior patent issued is immaterial.[85] It is not essential that the description and claims should be printed.[86]

Prior patent of wider scope. The fact that the art or instrument of the earlier patent was intended to, and will, accomplish more than the art or instrument of the later invention does not prevent its being an anticipation of the latter.[87] It is sufficient that in part it was intended to, and will, accomplish the same result in the same way.[88]

[§ 45] b. Actual Issuance Prior to Date of Invention Essential. In order that a patent may have effect as an anticipation, it must have issued anterior to the making of the invention or discovery in question.[89] It is not enough that it is anterior to the date upon which the inventor secured the issuance

"The statutes authorize the granting of patents only for such inventions as have not been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before the applicant's embodiment of his own conception. It may be a hardship to meritorious inventors, who, at the expenditure of much time and thought, have hit upon some ingenious combination of mechanical devices, which, for aught they know, is entirely novel, to find that, in some remote time and place, some one else, of whom they never heard, has published to the world, in a patent or a printed publication, a full description of the very combination over which they have been puzzling; but in such cases the act, none the less, refuses them a patent." [a] German gebrauchmuster.—(1) The instrument known under the German law as a "gebrauchmuster" is somewhat similar to a United States design patent. It protects a new construction, without relation to its technical effect. In distinction from a United States design patent, a German gebrauchmuster protects not only the outer appearance or shape or artistic design of the model, but also the construction of the inner parts thereof. In examining a gebrauchmuster in the German patent office, as to whether the same is to be registered or not, the title of the gebrauchmuster only is considered, since the latter only is made officially public by printing it in the proper German publication. Steiner v. Schwarz, 148 Fed. 868. (2) Whether a "gebrauchmuster" is to be given the effect of a patent as an anticipation seems to be in doubt. Permutit Co. v. Wadham, 13 F. (2d) 454. (3) In one case such effect was claimed and denied. Steiner v. Schwarz, supra. (4) In a later case the contrary view was taken. Safety Gas Lighter Co. v. Fischer, 236 Fed. 955 [aff 247 Fed. 1005 mem, 159 CCA 652].

of a patent,[90] or the date upon which he made application for a patent.[91] An invention is "patented," as that term is used in our statutes, when a patent investing the patentee with the grant of a monopoly is actually issued,[92] provided it is then made accessible to the public.[93] The term does not mean the preliminary proceedings.[94]

United States patents. While a different rule sometimes obtains where the issue is whether the inventor is the first inventor of the art or instrument for which a patent is claimed,[95] a United States patent speaks as an anticipation from the date of its issue rather than from the date of the application.[96]

English patents. An invention is not "patented" in England until the enrollment or sealing of the complete specifications,[97] and an English patent becomes effective as an anticipation only from the date of the enrollment of the complete specification.[98] If a provisional specification is filed, the invention so described is not "patented" until the complete specification has been filed and accepted.[99]

Canadian patents. A Canadian patent is effective as an anticipation from its date of issue.[1] The date upon which the patent is delivered to the patentee is immaterial.[2]

French patents. The date upon which a French patent becomes effective as an anticipation is the date of its issue.[3]

German patents. Under the patent laws of Germany, a patent granted becomes operative from the day following the filing of the application.[4] The publication or "ausgegeben" date is the date upon which the patent is actually issued,[5] and it is upon this latter date that a German patent becomes effective as an anticipation.[6]

Where a patent is issued in a foreign country and afterward in the United States, the date of the foreign application controls in determining anticipation.[7]

[§ 46] c. Sufficiency of Disclosure. In order that an invention may be anticipated by a prior patent the latter must disclose the complete and operative invention in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art to which the invention relates, or is most nearly connected, to prac-

tained.[25] Mere reference to the method comprising an invention without description and coupled with the declaration that such a method is inefficient does not amount to anticipation.[26] Prior patents, however, must be read in the light of the knowledge possessed by persons skilled in the art to which the invention relates,[27] including the teaching of earlier patents,[28] and publications;[29] and an invention is anticipated if, by the aid of such disclosures, they could have made and used it.[30] In other words, a patent is not deprived of its effect as an anticipation by the rule requiring full, clear, and exact description where the variation between what is described in it and the later invention consists only in matters not requiring inventive skill.[31] A patent is not rendered ineffective as an anticipation

(2) A fluid cooler for the water jacket of a gas engine, made by nesting a number of small tubes having their ends expanded and shaped so as to fit closely together and entirely fill and close the side faces of the cooler is anticipated by a patent for a similar device in which the tubes are fastened together by a wire so as to permit the passage of the warm water between them, where in the patentee's specification it is set forth that, instead of using wire, the tubes may be flanged at either end and secured together so as to form narrow channels between the pipes, thus providing a means for expanding the tubes. by the fact that its disclosures would not have enabled persons unskilled in the art to which the invention relates to make and use the invention.[32]

Advantages need not be described. The fact that a prior patent contains no description of the advantages of using the art or instrument which it discloses in the way pointed out by the later invention does not deprive it of effect as an anticipation.[33]

Identity of language unnecessary. It is not essential that the language used in describing the earlier invention be identical with the language by which the later inventor described his invention.[34]

Description of article of manufacture. A patent which describes an article of manufacture by enumerating its essential characteristics is not deprived of its effect as an anticipation by the fact that it does not describe the method of its manufacture.[35]

Drawings. Drawings attached to a prior patent may be used to explain any obscurity in the specification;[36] they are usually considered a part thereof,[37] and may even be relied upon to some extent to ascertain the form and position of some of the parts of a mechanism.[38] Anticipation is not disclosed by a drawing which only incidentally shows a similar arrangement of parts, where such arrangement is not essential to the first invention and was not adopted and used to perform the function which it performs in the second invention, and where the first patent contains no suggestion of the way in which the result sought is accomplished by the second inventor.[39] The fact that a drawing, through error of the draftsman, shows a construction contrary to the reading of the patent does not give it effect as an anticipation in that particular.[40] Where there is a conflict between the drawings of a patent and the specifications, as a rule the specifications must govern.[41]

[§ 47] d. Secret Patents. In order that an invention may be anticipated by a prior patent, the disclosures contained in the patent must be accessible to the public.[42] Patents are sometimes, for public and special reasons, kept secret.[43] Such patents, although issued, are not effective as anticipations.[44]

[§ 48] e. Paper Patents. The mere fact that the subject matter of a prior patent has not been perfected into a practical and commercially successful art or instrument does not deprive it of effect as an anticipation.[45] As in other cases,[46] the test of anticipation is whether the disclosure of the patent is sufficient to enable persons skilled in the art to which the invention relates to make and use the invention without the exercise of further invention.[47] A "paper patent" is inoperative as an anticipation if it fails to make such disclosure,[48] but not otherwise.[49] It has been asserted, however, that anticipatory matter which has never gone into practical

"To the argument that but one or two of the prior patents ever went into actual use in any structure built in concordance therewith, and that they are but paper patents, it is to be said that the question here is not that of the adaptability of a machine to operate successfully. It is the question whether or not the structures described in the prior art are such that they could be used in the precise manner in which the appellant's structure is used. Even in the case of machines, it is held that the fact that no commercial use has been made of a patented device does not affect its weight as anticipatory of a later patent, so far as concerns the inventive ideas it discloses." use is to be narrowly construed,[50] or, at least, used with great caution.[51]

[§ 49] f. Patents to Same Inventor—(1) In General. Subject to the exception which obtains with respect to inventions previously patented in a foreign country,[52] no valid patent can be obtained by an inventor for an invention actually claimed and secured to him in a prior patent,[53] nor for an essential element of an invention secured by a former patent without which that invention would not have been patentable.[54] The reason is that the power to create a monopoly is exhausted by the first patent, and that a new and later patent for the same invention would operate to extend or prolong the monopoly beyond the period allowed by law.[55] The earlier patent avoids the later even though issued on a later application.[56] The issue date of the patents, and not the application date, controls.[57] If both patents are issued on the same day, it seems that the patentee may elect which patent he shall rely upon as vesting the monopoly in him.[58] But while an earlier patent avoids a later patent to the same patentee for the invention claimed and secured by the former, a valid later patent may be obtained where the invention claimed is clearly distinct from, and independent of, the one previously patented.[59]

"It may be true, as is asserted by the complainant, that the patented can is the first which was ever actually manufactured and put upon the market which had a neck of double layers connected by a flush joint, or in which there was no soldered surface upon the inside. But whether such cans as are described in the prior patents were ever actually made, or not, is an immaterial consideration. These patents show so plainly what they purport to show that he who runs can read; and their effect in negativing the novelty of the claim cannot be impaired by any argument that they are impracticable structures." "We do not doubt that a patent which was never manufactured at all may serve as a complete anticipation, if it sufficiently discloses identity; but cases like the present give the proper field for the full effect which can rightly be carried by the deprecatory designation 'paper patents.' If earlier patents show a close analogy, with differences which, according to our present light, hardly seem material, and yet it appears that such a patent, or a succession of them, never found any commercial favor, this fact has evidential force to indicate that the differences are more important than they seem, and that the relatively slight later changes and adaptation to a different demand have a valid claim to inventive character." "Where the second patent covers matter described in the prior patent, essentially distinct and separable

This is so whether the invention subsequently patented is generic or specific,[60] or an original machine or process, or both, or an improvement thereon.[61] But it must distinctly appear that the invention for which the later patent is claimed was a separate invention, distinctly different from that covered by the first patent;[62] in other words, it must be something substantially different from that comprehended in the first patent.[63] It must consist in something more than mere distinction of the breadth or scope of the claims of each patent[64] or a mere difference in the terms in which the claims are couched.[65] The question to be decided is whether the claims of the later patent are for a separate invention from the claims allowed upon the first application,[66]—whether the power to create a monopoly has been invoked twice for the same thing,[67]—and the test is whether the claims of both patents define essentially the same things.[68] A process and the apparatus by which it is performed may be the subject of different patents.[69] So likewise may a machine or process and its product,[70] and different parts of the same machine.[71] An inventor may also obtain a separate patent for an improvement on a method or device previously patented by him.[72] But the mere function of the invention of the first patent cannot be made the subject of another patent.[73] The defense of double patenting does not apply between two independent inventors merely because one has taken an assignment of the other invention.[74] The assignment makes no difference, each patent standing precisely as though no assignment had been made.[75] The earlier invention prevails if the inventions patented are the same;[76] if they are different, both are valid.[77]

Design patents. The rule with respect to double patenting applies to design patents.[78] Double patenting, however, does not result where the invention covered by the subsequent patent is entirely distinct, different, and separable from the invention patented earlier.[79] There is some authority to the effect that the defense of double patenting may apply in the case of a design and of a mechanical patent applicable to the same device.[80] It has been asserted, however, that it is difficult to understand how double patenting can arise in such cases.[81] In any event, a mechanical patent is not void for double patenting where the prior design patent fails to show every essential feature of the article which the mechanical patent covers.[82] There is some authority also for the proposition that the defense of double patenting would not be affected by the invalidity of the earlier design patent.[83] It has been held, however, that, assuming double patenting may arise, the mechanical patent is not invalid if the prior design patent is void for want of patentability.[84]

[§ 50] (2) Unclaimed Disclosures of Patents Issued on Copending Applications. While the description by an inventor in a patent granted to him may operate as a disclaimer or abandonment of matter not claimed,[85] where each of several applications made by the same inventor describes the same in-from the invention claimed thereby and claims made thereunder, its validity may be sustained." Miller v. Eagle Mfg. Co., 151 U. S. 186, 198, 14 SCt 310, 38 L. ed. 121.

vention, but no one of the applications claim any invention claimed in the others, and they are all pending at the same time, a patent issued on one of them cannot be used to anticipate the right to a patent on another.[86] This is true regardless of the date upon which the applications were filed.[87] The issuance of the first patent does not abandon the unclaimed matter in its disclosure, the pendency of the second application rebutting any such inference.[88]

A patent granted on a divisional application relates back to the original application date,[89] and a patent granted on the latter does not anticipate the other.[90]

[§ 51] (3) Inventions Previously Patented Abroad. Congress has expressly provided that no person otherwise entitled thereto shall be debarred from receiving a patent for his invention or discovery, nor shall any patent be declared invalid by reason of its having been first patented or caused to be patented by the inventor or his legal representatives or assigns in a foreign country, unless the application for such foreign patent was filed more than twelve months prior to the filing of the application in this country in cases of mechanical patents, and four months in cases of designs.[91]

[§ 52] 5. Prior Description in Printed Publications—a. In General. With respect to anticipatory effect, prior patents and prior publications rest upon the same ground.[92] No valid patent can be obtained by an inventor for his invention if it was described in a printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof.[93] This is true even though the publication was unknown in this country[94] and to the subsequent inventor.[95] A prior description in a printed publication is not deprived of its effect as an anticipation by the fact that the art or instrument described was not reduced to practice commercially,[96] by the mere fact that it has not been in use,[97] or by the mere fact that the art or instrument described would require changes or additions if it was to be commercially successful.[98] Nor is the anticipatory effect of a patent destroyed by the fact that it was made for the purpose of giving the result of a series of tests.[99]

A printed publication put out by the inventor has the same effect as though it was put out by a stranger.[1]

[§ 53] b. What Constitutes a Printed Publication. A printed publication, in the view of the Patent Law, is anything that is printed and made accessible to any part of the public,[2] such as a book,[3] magazine article,[4] trade paper,[5] trade magazine,[6] catalogue,[7] scientific journal,[8] or journal of a learned society.[9] Mere printing in itself does not amount to publication.[10] Measures must be taken to render the thing containing the description accessible to some part of the public.[11] It is sufficient, of course, if copies are sold or distributed generally to the public,[12] or if copies are available in libraries.[13] It has been held, however, that a single copy of a book published in a foreign country not entered in the list of books contained in a library is not a publication.[14] It has been held that a description in a printed publication is not deprived of effect as an anticipation by the fact that the publication was intended for circulation among a particular class, and was not made accessible to the whole body of the public.[15] The contrary has also been held.[16] Under a former statute which called for prior description in a "public work" instead of in a "printed publication,"[17] it was held to be essential that the publication should be one intended for general use.[18]

Drawings unaccompanied by verbal description. A published drawing unaccompanied by verbal description is a description in a printed publication within the meaning of the statute.[19]

Void patents. A description contained in a void patent is a description in a printed publication.[20]

Unclaimed disclosures of prior patents. An invention is described in a printed publication if it is fully disclosed, although not claimed, in a United States patent,[21] and, subject to the exception which exists with reference to patents issued to the same inventor on copending applications,[22] an invention is anticipated if, at the date of its invention, it has already been so disclosed.[23] The failure of the patentee to include the device among the claims of his own invention implies either that he abandoned it to the public or that he regarded it as well-known.[24] The patent is evidence of the state of the art at the time the drawings and specifications upon which it was afterward granted were made, and it is the state of the art and not the patent which constitutes anticipation.[25]

Patent applications. A description contained in an application for a patent is not a description in a printed publication.[26] This is so, even though the application has been abandoned.[27] Abandoned or forfeited applications are not cited as references in the patent office.[28] The disclosures of a prior application may, however, establish prior knowledge or use.[29]

Design patents. The disclosures of a design patent may give such information of the character of the article to which it is attached that it will anticipate the claims of an inventor of a mechanical structure pertaining to it.[30]

English provisional specifications. A provisional specification published in England amounts to publication.[31]

ciency of a description in a printed publication is tested by the same rules as those applicable to the disclosures of prior patents.[33] In order that an invention may be anticipated by a description contained in a printed publication, the latter must disclose the complete and operative invention in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art to which the invention relates, or is most nearly connected, to practice the invention without the exercise of inventive skill of his own.[34] It has been asserted that this rule is enforced with particular strictness with respect to foreign publications.[35] A description in a prior publication must be given effect as an anticipation only to the extent that it actually gives information to the public with respect to the art or instrument in question.[36] Descriptions contained in a printed publication are considered as part of the prior art only as to what they disclose on their face,[37] unaided by extrinsic evidence,[38] except in so far as extrinsic evidence is necessary to elucidate and make clear what is disclosed.[39] Essential elements not obvious to those skilled in the art cannot be read into a description.[40] The question is, What does the prior publication say? not what it might have said, or what it should have said.[41] Published descriptions cannot be supplemented by proof that devices which are now said to be the embodiments of the publications were actually constructed and were operative.[42] An invention is not anticipated by mere suggestions which require further invention to reduce to practical use and operation,[43] or by vague, indefinite, general, or ambiguous references to the subject matter of the invention.[44] Nor is a mere assertion in a printed publication that a certain result had been accomplished, without describing the means which produced it, sufficient as an anticipation.[45] The prior publication must disclose how the desired result can be obtained.[46] Descriptions in prior printed publications, however, must be read in the light of the knowledge possessed by persons skilled in the art to which the invention relates,[47] including the disclosures of earlier publications,[48] and a description is sufficient if such persons are enabled by its disclosures to make and use the invention without exercising more than mere mechanical skill, even though it is in some respects incomplete[49] or obscure.[50]

Article of manufacture. Where a claim is for an article of manufacture the process of manufacture need not be described in the publication.[51] It is sufficient if the thing claimed is clearly and accurately described.[52]

[§ 55] 6. Evidence—a. Burden of Proof. The burden of proving that a method or device substantially identical with the method or device for which a patent is shown to have issued was known or used by others in this country, or was patented or described in a printed publication before the patentee or his assignor made his invention or discovery, and was consequently anticipated, is upon the party asserting it.[53] This rule is not altered by the fact that a patent office reference to a paper covering the subject matter of the patent, but which was not printed until less than two years before the application, was not attacked by the patentee.[54] If the date upon which application for the patent in suit was made is not in evidence, this burden is sustained prima facie when it is shown by evidence sufficiently clear and convincing that such method or device was made accessible to the public in any of the ways enumerated before the date of the patent.[55] If the date of application is in evidence, anticipation is made out prima facie by proof of disclosure to the public before that date.[56] Anticipation having been made out prima facie, the party seeking to maintain the validity of the patent has the burden of producing proof that the patentee or his assignor made the invention or discovery at an earlier date.[57]

[§ 56] b. Admissibility. The rules governing the admissibility of evidence generally[58] are applicable in determining whether a method or device for which a patent has been issued has been anticipated.[59] Competent evidence of any fact bearing upon the question of identity of the alleged anticipation with the method or device of the patent, or upon whether it was made accessible to the public before the patentee or his assignor made his invention or discovery, is admissible.[60] Where a patent is offered

[a] Evidence held admissible to show alleged anticipation inoperative. —Harwood v. Mill River Woolen Mfg. Co., 11 F. Cas. No. 6,187, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 526.

[b] Evidence held admissible to

in evidence to show anticipation, the court must first construe it,[61] and, if by its true construction it has a tendency to support the issue, it is admissible,[62] but, if it has no such tendency, it must be excluded.[63] In determining whether one invention anticipates another, evidence may be, and in a difficult case ought to be, heard concerning the construction and actual operation of the devices respectively.[64] The fact that the alleged anticipation was known to persons who experimented to produce the subsequent invention but failed to do so is admissible to show lack of identity.[65] The fact that the later method or device superseded the earlier is also admissible for that purpose.[66] Negative testimony of persons whose business and experience were adapted to bring to them a knowledge of all improvements therein to the effect that no such improvement as that covered by the patent in suit had previously come to their knowledge is admissible in contradiction of evidence tending to show prior knowledge or use.[67] Evidence of an acknowledgment that the patentee was the original inventor is also admissible.[68] A drawing, unaccompanied by any evidence that it was actually published or otherwise made accessible to the public, is not admissible to show that the method or device shown was described in a printed publication,[69] but a drawing is not rendered inadmissible by the mere fact that it is not accompanied by a written description of the method or device represented.[70] Evidence of prior use in foreign countries not shown to be known by the patentee and not patented or described in any printed publication is not admissible.[71] Evidence of such character as to be rendered incompetent under the general rules with respect to hearsay evidence is likewise inadmissible.[72] A mere statement, printed at the head of an application for a patent, that the original application was filed at a prior date, cannot be considered as evidence to carry the date of invention back to the time stated.[73]

[§ 57] c. Weight and Sufficiency. The burden of proving anticipation of a method or device for which a patent has been granted must be sustained by clear and convincing proof[74]—proof frequently characterized as sufficiently clear, certain, and precise as to satisfy beyond reasonable doubt.[75] The evi-

grave suspicion,[84] and must be closely scrutinized.[85] But this rule is not inflexible.[86] Oral testimony, although lacking such corroboration, may be so definite, specific, and worthy of credence as to satisfy a court of the fact of prior knowledge or use.[87] Prior knowledge or use cannot be said to have been proved beyond a reasonable doubt by oral testimony where other and conclusive proof in the form of the alleged anticipatory device exists and no effort was made to produce it or to excuse the omission.[88] In determining the weight to be given the testimony of witnesses who speak from personal recollection only, the length of time elapsed since the alleged prior use is to be considered.[89] So also is the complexity or simplicity of the method or device involved.[90] The presumption of validity is not overcome by oral testimony which is indefinite and contradictory.[91] Prior use may be established by the testimony of a single witness.[92]

Earlier invention or discovery, when it is sought to be shown, must also be established by satisfactory and convincing proof,[93] so cogent as to leave no reasonable doubt in the mind of the trier of fact.[94] The evidence must satisfactorily show both earlier conception and reasonable diligence in reduction to practice.[95]

[§ 58] D. Utility—1. In General. The purpose declared by the constitution as the motive for conferring the power upon congress to grant patents, and the language employed by congress in prescribing the conditions upon which these rights are given, both place emphasis upon usefulness.[96] The power is conferred "for the purpose of promoting the progress of science and the useful arts,"[97] and the right to obtain a patent is given to one whose invention or discovery is "useful."[98] Furthermore, the commissioner of patents is authorized to issue letters patent only if it shall appear "that the same is sufficiently useful and important."[99] In order that a valid patent may be obtained an invention must not only be new,[1] but it must also possess the attribute of utility.[2]

"As we have had occasion before to observe, oral testimony, unsupported by patents or exhibits, tending to show prior use of a device regularly patented is, in the nature of the case, open to grave suspicion. Washburn, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Beat 'Em All Barbed-Wire Co., 143 U. S. 275, 12 SCt 443, 36 L. ed. 154. Granting the witnesses to be of the highest character, and never so conscientious in their desire to tell only the truth, the possibility of their being mistaken as to the exact device used, which, though bearing a general resemblance to the one patented, may differ from it in the very particular which makes it patentable, are such as to render oral testimony peculiarly untrustworthy; particularly so if the testimony be taken after the lapse of years from the time the alleged anticipating device was used." [§ 59] 2. What Constitutes Patentable Utility. An invention is "useful," as that term is used in the statute, if it is capable of performing some beneficial function claimed for it.[3] A method or device lacks utility if it is wholly inoperative so far as its claimed functions are concerned.[4] Total incapacity with respect to part only of the functions claimed for an invention does not amount to lack of utility within the meaning of the statute.[5] An invention is "useful" if it is capable of accomplishing one of the functions claimed, although not others.[6] Language is to be found in some of the decisions indicating that the requirement of utility is satisfied if the invention is useful for any beneficial purpose,[7] but this expression is to be taken in a general sense as applicable to all patents, and not as implying in a particular case, where the thing invented is worthless for the purpose intended, but of possible useful application to some other, that a patent may, nevertheless, be obtained.[8] It has been held that the usefulness of an invention need not flow directly from the art or instrument itself considered apart from any connection with, or application to, other devices or instrumentalities.[9] Expression, however, has been given to a contrary view.[10]

[§ 60] 3. Degree of Utility Required. The word "useful" is to be given a practical and not a specula-

[a] "Patentable utility" distinguished from "invention."—"The phrase 'patentable utility' is sometimes perhaps rather inaccurately used to denote the function of being useful plus the skill of the inventor as distinguished from that of the mechanic. . . . When some courts, and this among them, have, in the course of denying patentability, thrown doubts upon utility, doubtless they have intended, as we have, to refer to the lack of any useful function or new result serving to give inventive character to the slight step which the patentee had taken, in differentiation from the prior art. [a] Reason for rule.—"Patents for simple devices, and patents for parts of machines, are almost numberless, of which it may be truly said, that it is only by connection with other devices or instrumentalities, to which they are intended to be applied, that they can be made to produce any result whatever. True, the patentee is bound to disclose a mode in which they may be rendered practically useful, and it may be one of many modes, and it may necessarily involve the use of many other known devices which are required in order to [effect] the useful result. Patents may be granted for combinations, in which some of the parts are old and some are new, and whatever in the several parts is new may be separately secured to the inventor; and yet it may be true that only in the combination described, or in some similar combination, is the new part thus secured to the inventor of any practical use whatever." [a] Rule applied.—Claims for a wrapping consisting of a continuous strip of paper wound spirally about an annular object and a strip of tape adhesively applied to folds of the first strip to hold them in fixed relation are invalid as claiming a distinct article, a wrapping, which could not be manufactured or exist apart from the object wrapped. Terkelsen Mach. Co. v. Pierce Wrapping Mach. Co., 5

tive meaning.[11] It is used in contradistinction to "frivolous."[12] Even though an invention possesses capacity to produce a claimed result, it lacks patentable utility if that result is of no possible advantage to the public.[13] The commissioner of patents may refuse to issue a patent for such an invention,[14] and, while there are expressions in some of the decisions indicating the contrary,[15] a patent issued for such an invention cannot be sustained.[16] It has been held that, even if the invention can be made to accomplish the purpose intended, it is not useful, if from its inherent nature it will accomplish the purpose only to such a restricted extent as to make its use in industry prohibitive.[17] But any degree of advantage, however slight, is sufficient.[18] Such advantage may reside in mere simplicity[19] or cheapness of construction.[20] An invention need not be of such general utility as to supersede all other existing means of accomplishing the same object.[21] It is not required that an invention be a commercial success,[22] or even that it be commercially practical.[23] Nor is it essential that the invention should be the best of its kind or incapable of improvement.[24] Every patent as to utility depends on the state of the art at the time of the claim made or patent issued;[25] and if the invention was useful when the patent was granted, the fact that it has become useless since by the discovery of some other method which dispenses with it gives no right to others to use it.[26]

[§ 61] 4. Inoperativeness Curable by Mechanical Skill. The necessity for the correction of minor structural defects before an invention will work at all does not necessarily establish a false inventive concept.[27] Imperfections of this character, not affecting the substance of the invention, and which are

"The defendant, however, has asserted a much more broad and sweeping doctrine; and one, which I feel myself called upon to negative in the most explicit manner. He contends, that it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove, that his invention is of general utility; so that in fact, for the ordinary purposes of life, it must supersede the pumps in common use. In short, that it must be, for the public, a better pump than the common pump; and that unless the plaintiff can establish this position, the law will not give him the benefit of a patent, even though in some peculiar cases his invention might be applied with advantage. I do not so understand the law. The Patent Act [Act Febr. 21, 1793, c 11 (1 St. at L. 318)] uses the phrase 'useful invention' merely incidentally; it occurs only in the first section, and there it seems merely descriptive of the subject matter of the application, or of the conviction of the applicant. The language is, 'when any person or persons shall allege, that he or they have invented any new and useful art, machine,' &c., he or they may, on pursuing the directions of the Act, obtain a patent. Neither the oath required by the second section, nor the special matter of defence allowed to be given in evidence by the sixth section of the act, contains any such qualification or reference to general utility, to establish the validity of the patent. Nor is it alluded to in the tenth section as a cause, for which the patent may be vacated. To be sure, all the matters of defence or of objection to the patent are not enumerated in these sections. Whitemore v. Cutter, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,600, Gall. 429, 435, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 28. But if such an one as that now contended for, had been intended, it is scarcely possible to account for its omission. In my judgment the argument is utterly without foundation. All that the law requires is, that the invention should not be frivolous or injurious to the well-being, good policy, or sound morals of society." Per Story, J., in Lowell v. Lewis, supra.

curable by mechanical skill, do not render an invention inoperative,[28] and the fact that certain changes, within the realm of the skill of the mechanic experienced in the particular art, are necessary to successful operation will not support a claim that the invention lacks utility.[29] It is sufficient if one skilled in the art could produce the result from the means described.[30]

[§ 62] 5. Inventions Operating Imperfectly. Mere imperfections not affecting the substance of an invention do not render it lacking in patentable utility.[31] The invention may be imperfect in its operation; but if it embodies the generic principle, and works, that is, if it actually and mechanically performs, although only in a crude way, the important function by which it makes the substantial change claimed for it in the art, it is enough.[32] In other words, it is sufficient if the result claimed can be produced by the means disclosed, even though not the most efficient,[33] and even though an improvement may be necessary to commercial success.[34] This rule, it has been asserted, applies with particular force to generic inventions.[35] Nor is it always essential that an invention be so perfect as never to fail in the production of the result claimed for it.[36] Such failure is fatal if it is due to a defect in the principle of the invention,[37] or to the absence of some necessary element,[38] but not otherwise.[39]

[§ 63] 6. Harmful Inventions. The term "useful" is employed in contradistinction to "mischievous" or "immoral."[40] An invention capable only of

[a] Reason for rule.—"The proposition upon which they appear to lay the greatest stress is that neither patent describes or claims an operative machine because neither is capable of 'perfect justification,' viz.: making lines of exactly the same length. Their contention proceeds upon the untenable proposition that the machine which produced the 'linotype' was valueless because it did not produce an absolutely perfect 'linotype.' Such a proposition, if sustained, would condemn to obscurity some of the greatest works of human genius. A great poem may be marred because the meter halts at times, but it is a great poem still. Even the masterpiece of Rubens was improved by the touch of his pupil, Van Dyck. . . . Concede that the machine when first produced was not perfect and that to Schuckers belongs the credit of producing the spacers which made it perfect. Cui bono? It would certainly be a novel doctrine to deny to an inventor the fruits of a broad invention because the machine which first embodied it was rudimentary in character and failed to do as good work as improved machines made subsequently. None of the great inventions could survive such a test. Ten years after the invention of Howe, the machine first made by him would hardly have satisfied the least exacting sewing woman. The Dodds and Stephenson locomotive would, only a short time after its construction, have been discarded as behind the age even by the savages of Tasmania. The telephone of Bell is not the perfected telephone of commerce, the Morse telegraph is looked upon to-day as an interesting antique. And yet, it would be an unheard of proposition to withhold from these illustrious men the credit they deserve because their machines were crude at first and were improved afterwards." a use considered harmful to the body politic lacks patentable utility,[41] as, for example, one useful only for the purpose of perpetrating fraud,[42] or for the purpose of accomplishing an immoral[43] or unlawful[44] result. Likewise, no invention can be regarded as useful within the meaning of the patent law if its use constantly exposes the operator to risk of great bodily injury.[45] However, if an invention is capable of producing a beneficial result it may be patentable, notwithstanding it may also be used for some mischievous or immoral purposes.[46] But, in an action to restrain infringement, a court may refuse to grant an injunction pendente lite where the evidence shows that the only use to which the invention has ever been put is illegal and no evidence is produced to support the claim that it may be used for some proper purpose.[47]

[§ 64] 7. Evidence of Utility—a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. In accord with the general rule that the issuance of a patent gives rise to a presumption that the qualities essential to patentability are present in the subject matter,[48] a presumption that an invention possesses utility arises upon the issuance of a patent.[49] The burden of proving that an invention lacks utility is on the party asserting it.[50] In other words, a patent is at least prima facie evidence that the invention for which it issued possesses utility.[51] Expression has been given to the view that the issuance of a patent should carry with it something more than a bare prima facie.[52]

[§ 65] b. Admissibility. Utility or lack of utility in an invention may be evidenced by inspection or physical demonstration of the method or instrument in which it is embodied,[53] by opinions of persons skilled in the particular art,[54] by testimony showing the results of experiments conducted for the purpose of determining the question of the invention's utility,[55] the state of the art at the time of the invention,[56] or any other fact from which capability or incapability to perform the functions claimed for the invention may be inferred.[57] Testimony that the invention has actually been used for the purpose intended is, of course, evidence of utility.[58] On the other hand, lack of utility may be evidenced by the fact that a person skilled in the art to which the invention relates has endeavored, in good faith, to make the invention work, and has been unable to do so.[59] Such evidence is, of course, overthrown if it is demonstrated by practical experiments made by several persons that they have succeeded in producing the results claimed for the invention.[60] Utility may be evidenced by sales or commercial demand.[61] No implication of inutility arises from the mere fact that an invention has never been tried out,[62] from the mere fact of failure to manufacture,[63] or from mere nonuse.[64] Nor does such an inference arise from the mere fact of cessation of manufacture.[65] However, an inference of inutility may arise from nonuse, long continued and unexplained by lack of means or opportunity.[66] It is otherwise where the utility of the invention is indicated by success of an infringement.[67]

Infringement as evidence of utility. Infringement is evidence of utility.[68] It is fair to presume that the person using an invention would not do so if he thought it of no utility.[69] While some criticism of the rule has been expressed,[70] an infringer, ordinarily, is estopped to deny the utility of an invention.[71] It is otherwise, however, where the acts of infringement were committed by the patentee

"Having admitted infringement (imitation), the issue of utility seems to be foreclosed. Du Bois v. Kirk, 158 U. S. 58, 64, 15 SCt 729, 39 L. ed. 895. That this should be so seems to this court an anomaly. A patented article may be lacking in utility in either one of two senses: It may be useful, but capable only of a use considered harmful to the body politic, viz. gambling (National Automatic Device Co. v. Lloyd, 40 Fed. 89, 5 LRA 784), or counterfeiting (Rickard v. Du Bon, 103 Fed. 868, 43 CCA 360). On the other hand, it may be actually useless, either because it will not work (Ex p. Sanders, 21 F. Cas. No. 12,292), or because, even if it has the capacity to produce the result, that result is of no advantage to the public (Troy Laundry Mach. Co. v. Columbia Mfg. Co., 217 Fed. 787)." Tolfree v. while acting for the infringer as one of its responsible agents.[72]

[§ 66] c. Weight and Sufficiency. It has been asserted that it requires but slight evidence of successful operation to establish utility.[73] Lack of utility, however, must be shown by clear and satisfactory evidence.[74] This, it has been asserted, is particularly true of primary or generic inventions.[75] The presumption of utility which arises upon the issuance of the patent is not negatived by the fact that the invention is susceptible of improvement,[76] or that like inventions are so far superior to it that they may entirely supersede the use of it.[77] Nor is it negatived by the fact that it is found desirable to use additional apparatus in connection with the invention,[78] or that certain changes within the realm of the skill of a person skilled in the art are necessary to successful operation.[79] The fact that the invention has been infringed is ordinarily sufficient to establish its utility,[80] at least as against the infringer.[81] Doubts relative to the question of utility should be resolved against infringers.[82] Proof of substantial commercial demand is ordinarily sufficient to establish the utility of an invention,[83] but the fact that an invention is not commercially developed does not establish lack of utility.[84] Continued use over a period of time is rather conclusive evidence of utility.[85]

Ex parte experiments, conducted for the purpose of proving the inutility of an invention, cannot overcome the inference of utility which arises from proof that the invention has attained wide acceptance in the trade.[86]

[§ 67] E. Invention—1. Necessity for Invention. Congress has authorized the grant of a patent to any person who has "invented or discovered" any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvements thereof.[87] No valid patent can be obtained for a method or device which lacks invention.[88] Invention or discovery is the requirement which constitutes the

"No matter how novel, no matter how useful, a device may be, without evidence that the designer has exhibited some degree of skill or ingenuity in contriving something new, which surpasses a showing of mechanical skill, are we permitted to say that he has invented something and hold a patent valid. In the absence of this element of invention, the patent, if issued, must be held invalid, no matter how novel or useful it may be." Smokador Mfg. Co. v. Tubular Products Co., 27 F. (2d) 948, 951.

step in advance in the useful arts.[91] It was never the object of the patent laws to grant a monopoly for every trifling device, every shadow of a shade of an idea, which would naturally and spontaneously occur to any skilled mechanic or operator in the ordinary progress of manufacture.[92] A method or device which is the product of mere mechanical skill is not patentable.[93] This is true no matter how new or useful that product may be.[94] To authorize the allowance of a patent there must be a substantial difference in principle from prior inventions.[95]

[§ 68] 2. Degree of Invention Required. An inventor's right to a patent is not affected by the fact that his invention is small and simple, requiring no high degree of imagination, where a distinct advance in the art is achieved.[96] But if there is invention to any extent it is sufficient.[97] The extent of advance in the art which the inventor makes is immaterial.[98]

Where an art has been advanced step by step by a series of inventions, so that no one inventor can claim the complete whole, each inventor is entitled to the specific form of device which he produces, so far as it differs from those of his competitors.[99]

The extent of the mental process is immaterial.[1] The mere fact that study, effort, and experience were required for the production of the device or method is not sufficient.[2] The right to a patent does not depend upon the quantity of thought, ingenuity, skill, labor, or experiment which was bestowed upon the production.[3] The result may come out of long consideration,[4] or it may be the revelation of a flash of thought.[5]

[§ 69] 3. Degree of Physical Change Immaterial. The fact that the physical changes from other devices were slight is immaterial if they were essential to the purpose sought to be accomplished.[6]

[§ 70] 4. Nature and Character of an Invention—a. In General. An invention is a new idea of means created by the exercise of the inventive faculty for the attainment of some useful purpose.[7] It is a mental result,[8] a concept,[9] a thing evolved from the mind,[10] a product of the intellect,[11] a new idea of means generated by the mind of the inventor,[12] the embodiment of the inventive idea.[13] Considered in itself, an invention is neither an end, nor a combination of both means and end, but is a means for the attainment of an end.[14] The act of invention, that is, the exercise of the inventive faculty resulting in the creation of a new idea of means,[15]—the finding out, the contriving, the creating of something which did not exist before, by an operation of the intellect,[16]—is primarily a mental act,[17] consisting of the conception of the idea and of means for putting it in practice and producing the desired result.[18] It is not a revelation of something existing but unknown,[19] but is the creation of something which did not exist before, possessing the elements of novelty and utility in kind and measure different from, and greater than, what the art might expect from its skilled workers.[20] One has not made an invention merely because he was the first to see the occasion or appreciate the advisability of doing the thing.[21] Merely to avail of the store of accumulated and accessible knowledge is not invention.[22] There must be some addition to the common stock of knowledge.[23] The mere exercise of good judgment is not an act of invention.[24]

Merely to perceive the end desired is not invention.[25] The act of invention must conclude a conception of the means by which the desired result may be attained.[26] This conception must be complete and ready to be put in some practical form.[27] There must be a definite idea of the complete and operative invention as it is thereafter to be applied in practice.[28] The inventive act is not complete if the exercise of further invention is required to enable the method or device conceived to perform its functions in the manner proposed by the inventor.[29] The idea must have been so far perfected as to require only mechanical skill successfully to apply it in practice.[30] Invention cannot be predicated of mere speculation or conjecture;[31] it must be based upon something ascertained,[32] something definite and certain.[33]

"Invention" and "discovery" synonymous. There is no distinction between the terms "invention" and "discovery" as they are used in the patent law.[34]

[§ 71] b. Unrecognized Productions. The mere fact that the discovery made by the inventor was accidental does not deprive the method or device of its character as an invention.[35] Invention, however, necessarily involves a conscious element,[36] and mere accidental production without conscious recognition of the result or the mode of producing it is not invention.[37] But the mere failure of the inventor to appreciate all the benefits and possibilities of his invention does not deprive him of protection therefor.[38] The inventor is entitled to the benefit of the uses to which his invention can be applied, and every way in which it can be utilized to perform its function, whether or not he was aware of all of these uses or methods of use or not.[39] If there be in the concept an actual advantage and the structure embodying the concept discloses invention, a patent will not fail merely because the principal advantages of the invention prove to be different from the one chiefly in the inventor's mind.[40]

Inventor's ignorance of underlying principles. An inventor's right to a patent is not affected by the fact that he did not understand the scientific theory or the natural laws underlying his invention.[41] It is sufficient if he generated the idea of means whereby the application of the abstract principle is brought about.[42]

[§ 72] 5. Invention and Attainment of Improved Result Distinguished. Not every improvement is invention.[43] While superior utility is a circumstance to be considered in determining the question of invention,[44] the attainment of comparative superiority or greater excellence in that which is already known does not of itself amount to invention.[45] There must be something more than a mere carrying forward or more extended application of an original idea of an-old device or method is not patentable merely because it can be produced more cheaply,[51] because it is more merchantable[52] or more attractive in appearance.[53] Nor is simplicity alone the test of invention.[54] A thing must be new in itself and not merely in workmanship.[55] A machine-made article is not patentable over one which is handmade or rough.[56]

[§ 73] 6. Invention and the Exercise of Mechanical Skill Distinguished. Mechanical skill is the suggestion of common experience which arises spontaneously and by necessity of human reasoning in the minds of those acquainted with the circumstances with which they have to deal.[57] It is but the display of the expected skill of the calling, involving only the exercise of the ordinary faculties of reasoning upon the material supplied by a special knowledge, and the facility of manipulation which results from its habitual and intelligent practice;[58] the doing of no more than anyone skilled in the art would do in the ordinary and natural development of the art;[59] the production of what a skilled mechanic would produce upon suggestion of what was required.[60] Mere mechanical skill can never rise to the sphere of invention.[61] The latter involves higher thought and brings into activity a different faculty.[62] The lowest order of invention is something more than mechanical skill,[63] and the highest degree of mechanical skill is something less than invention.[64] It has been asserted that no entirely satisfactory test has ever been found by which a line can be drawn between the product of inventive skill and the results of mechanical skill.[65] The test generally applied in distinguishing invention from mechanical skill is whether what was produced was obvious to persons skilled in the art and acquainted with the common knowledge in that art at the date the art or instrument

[a] Definition an impracticable test.—"The truth is the word cannot be defined in such manner as to afford any substantial aid in determining whether a particular device involves an exercise of the inventive faculty or not. In a given case we may be able to say that there is present invention of a very high order. In another we can see that there is lacking that impalpable something which distinguishes invention from simple mechanical skill. Courts, adopting fixed principles as a guide, have by a process of exclusion determined that certain variations in old devices do or do not involve invention; but whether the variation relied upon in a particular case is anything more than ordinary mechanical skill is a question which cannot be answered by applying the test of any general definition." McClain v. Ort-was created.[66] The alleged inventor is conclusively presumed to have known what was then known to such persons,[67] and if the solution of the problem demonstrated by the method or device which he claims to have invented was obvious to those skilled in the art to which it relates at the time of his conception, its production is held to involve only mechanical skill.[68] On the other hand, if those skilled in the art did not then know how to achieve the result accomplished by the method or device conceived by him, his solution of the problem is held to involve invention.[69] The fact that the invention seems simmayer, 141 U. "Doubtless it is always a difficult question to say, when any step is taken in art, what degree of imagination it required. Possibly judges are not well qualified to restate to themselves the stage in the technique of the art reached when the step was taken, or try to put themselves in the position of those who took it, yet the settled law requires them to do so, and, if not, novelty and invention would be synonymous. I know of no objective test which will serve to answer that question, which arises in nearly every case; it must be solved by an attempt to reconstruct the scope and limits of imagination of the ordinary skilled man." "Invention or discovery is the requirement which constitutes the foundation of the right to obtain a patent; and it was decided by this court, more than a quarter of a century ago, that unless more ingenuity and skill were required in making or applying the said improvement than are possessed by an ordinary mechanic acquainted with the business, there is an absence of that degree of skill and ingenuity which constitute the essential elements of every invention. Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. (U. S.) 248, 13 L. ed. 683." Dunbar v. Meyers, 94 U. S. 187, 197, 24 L. ed. 34.

is announced, the skilled mechanic readily understands it,[71] or with slight or no difficulty builds the new device by practices or means well-known to his trade.[72] The question is, Was it simple or obvious before it was done?[73] Another test is whether some new result is brought about by new means, or by a new arrangement of old ones.[74] The latter is an objective test.[75] Measured by it invention is involved if the result of an idea is a method or thing involving a new function,[76] or an old function arrived at by new means.[77]

[§ 74] 7. Change of Form, Proportions, or Degree. A mere change in an existing means involving a difference only in form, proportions, or degree, and resulting in doing substantially the same thing in the same way, by substantially the same means, but with better results, is not invention.[78] Such changes amount only to a mere carrying forward or more extended application of an original idea of another.[79] It is otherwise, however, if a change in form produces a new and useful result.[80] Where the need therefor is obvious, there is no invention in mere enlarging[81] or strengthening,[82] or in increasing the weight of a device.[83] The same is true with respect to mere diminution in size[84] or reduction in quantity.[85] In an earlier statute it was expressly provided that simply changing the form or proportions of any machine or composition of matter in any degree should not be deemed a discovery.[86]

[§ 75] 8. Substitution of Materials. Whether the substitution of one material for another in making one or more or all the parts of a machine or manufacture amounts to invention depends upon whether what was obvious to persons skilled in the art was gone beyond in so doing.[87] No invention is involved in making a substitution where the desirability of doing so would be obvious to the skilled in the art,[88] as where the article when made performs the same function in substantially the same way, having no advantages over the old structure other than those attributable solely to the known qualities of the substituted material.[89] The rule applies even where the material is new and was invented by the one

claiming the substitution as his invention.[90] There may be invention, however, where the substitution involved a new mode of construction,[91] or if it developed new properties and uses of the article made,[92] or where it produces a new mode of operation,[93] or results in a new function,[94] or when it is the first practical success in the art in which the substitution is made,[95] or where the practice shows its superiority to consist not only in greater cheapness and greater utility, but also in more efficient action.[96] And substitution may be considered on the issue of invention where it makes possible changes in other elements of a combination to produce improved operation.[97] Invention may reside in substitution of a material for a particular purpose, even though other materials of the same class have been used before for the same purposes,[98] and even though a patent has been previously granted for the use of the whole class.[99] It is immaterial also that the inventor stumbled upon the discovery.[1] But it must appear not only that there is a special advantage attached to the use of the particular substance claimed,[2] but also that its use is not the result of judgment and skill in the selection of materials,[3] nor a probable consequence of the natural development of the art.[4] The substitution of one material for another does not amount to an invention merely because it permits the article to be made or sold more cheaply,[5] or merely because it renders the article otherwise comparatively superior.[6]

[§ 76] 9. Changing Proportions of Ingredients of a Composition. While invention may reside in changing the proportions of the ingredients of a composition,[7] simply to change the proportions of the ingredients of a known composition is not invention.[8] The act of 1793 expressly so declared.[9] To amount to invention the new characteristics of the composition must be other than, and not confined to, the mere augmentation or diminution of the known characteristics of the several ingredients, which is in correlation with the increased or diminished amount of the respective ingredients entering into the composition.[10] There must be shown new results from the new proportions, developing a new product,[11] or an old product with new characteristics of structure or performance.[12] The mere fact that a better result is attained is not enough.[13]

[§ 77] 10. Change of Location of Parts. Ordinarily changes of the relative location of parts without changing the functions performed is not invention,[14] even though better results are thereby attained.[15] But a change of mechanism from one position to another, whereby a problem is solved and new and useful results are obtained, is an indication of invention.[16]

Mere reversal of parts, producing no new result, does not constitute invention.[17] It may be otherwise, however, if, by reversal of parts, a new result is produced.[18]

[§ 78] 11. Duplication of Parts.[19] While duplication of parts may constitute invention if the plurality of parts produces a new result,[20] mere duplication of well-known devices, each working in an old and well-known way, and no new result being obtained, is not invention.[21] The test is not whether duplication exists, but whether duplication produces not mere duplication of product or function, but a new result, and not a mere aggregate of prior sep-machine or manufacture." Acme Card System Co. v. Globe-Wernicke Co., 23 F. (2d) 523, 525.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where the

arate parts.[22]

[§ 79] 12. Omission of Parts.[23] While the omission of an element in a combination may constitute invention if the result of the new combination be the same as before,[24] yet if the omission of an element is attended by a corresponding omission of the function performed by that element, there is no invention, if the elements retained perform the same function as before.[25]

[§ 80] 13. Reversal of Movement of Parts. A mere reversal of movement of the same parts of an old device does not constitute invention.[26] This is true, however, only when the reversal can be made without change of parts or the functions of parts.[27] It is not a mere reversal of movement if the reversal involves the addition or subtraction or modification of parts,[28] or if any of the movements essential to the old device must give way to different movements.[29]

[§ 81] 14. Making Parts Integral or Separate. Ordinarily no more than mechanical skill, as distinguished from invention, is involved in uniting several parts of an existing device into an integral construction,[30] or in making in several parts what was formerly in one.[31] Whether what was done amounted to making into two parts what was single, or vice versa, is, of course, no absolute test of want of invention.[32] Such change may constitute invention.[33] The question in each case is whether the change involved a new display of ingenuity beyond the compass of the routinist.[34]

[§ 82] 15. Making Device Portable. There is no invention in merely making an old device in such form that it is portable.[35]

use of one deflecting plate in a lumber sawing machine was old, there is no invention in using two such plates. Dunbar v. Meyers, 94 U. S. 187, 24 L. ed. 34. a hand operation,[36] particularly where the mechanism, in a way of its own, dispenses with the human element.[37] But where there has been no substantial change in the mechanics or method of making a product and the steps are the same and the succession from one to the other is the same as those in the manual art, the general rule of the patent law is against invention.[38]

[§ 84] 17. Application to New Use. The application of an old method or device to a similar or analogous subject with no change in the manner of applying it and no result substantially distinct in its nature is not invention.[39] This is true, even if the new form of result has not before been contemplated,[40] and regardless of how remote the new use may be from the old if no changes or modifications in the old device are necessary to adapt it to the new use.[41] Invention is not involved in the mere conception of applying an old method or device to a new use.[42] Even though changes or modifications are essential to the practical application of the method or device to the new use, invention is not involved if the new use is so analogous to the old that the thought of adapting the device and applying it to the new use would occur to a person skilled in the art and seeking to devise means to perform the desired function.[43] The adaptation of the new device does

[§ 85] 18. Substitution of Equivalents.[48] The substitution of an "equivalent" for any element of a method or device is not invention.[49] This is true, even though the substitution produces a better result,[50] and even though the act or thing substituted performs some new and additional function.[51] It is immaterial that the act or thing substituted is unlike the act or thing for which it is substituted in name[52] or form,[53] or that it has more or less parts.[54] An "equivalent" of an act or thing is, in the sense of the patent law, an act or thing known by persons skilled in the art to be capable of performing the same function in substantially the same way.[55] It is regarded as being the same as the thing itself.[56] An "equivalent" is something different from a substitute.[57] To be the "equivalent" of an element of a method or device an act or thing must not only perform the same function in the method or device,[58] but it must also perform that function in substantially the same manner,[59] and its capability for that purpose must be obvious to persons skilled in the art.[60] An act or thing is not an "equivalent" if it varies in any manner the idea of means,[61] or affects it in any degree.[62]

Chemical equivalents. While the reactions and phenomena of chemistry may sometimes dictate a rule as to equivalents, which is at variance to the rule as applied to mere physical or mechanical equivalents,[63] it has been asserted that there is no reason for applying a different rule in a case where the known effect produced by one chemical element is in all respects similar to the effects produced by other elements already used,[64] especially when operating in combination upon substances possessing well-known characteristics.[65] It is only when the reactions and phenomena of chemistry are latent and undeveloped that the rule has application.[66]

[§ 86] 19. Combinations—a. In General. There may be invention in selecting and combining or uniting two or more simple methods or devices into a unitary method or device,[67] or in introducing an ad-

Walker Patents (4th ed) § 354 [quot Maunula v. Sunell, 155 Fed. 535, 539]. (2) "An equivalent, in the law of patents, is defined to be 'any act or substance which is known in the arts as a proper substitute for some other act or substance, employed already as an element in an invention, whose substitution for that other act or substance does not in any manner vary the idea of means. It possesses three characteristics: (1) It must be capable of performing the same office in the invention as the act or substance whose place it supplies; (2) it must relate to the form of embodiment alone, and not affect in any degree the idea of means; (3) it must have been known in the arts, at the date of the patent, as endowed with this capability.'" Whether a combination amounts to invention depends on whether or not it was an obvious one for attaining the advantage proposed, and one which would occur to any person skilled in the art to which it relates.[72] If mechanical skill is adequate to make the selection of elements from methods or devices in the prior art and their union or combination in a new method or device, there is, of course, no invention.[73] No invention is involved in combining known elements or their mechanical equivalents in substantially the same way as in a prior method or device to produce substantially the same

"A mere aggregation of old and well-known devices may or may not be patentable, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case. If the combination claimed is an obvious one for attaining the advantages proposed, and one which would occur to any mechanic skilled in the art, it would not be patentable; and, if otherwise, it may be." result,[74] or in the mere extension of the use of an old combination, where no new result is produced and no new method is found for producing the old result.[75] Nor is it invention to combine old devices into a new article without producing a new mode of operation.[76] The test of the presence of invention in a combination is sometimes said to be whether a new result is accomplished.[77] It has been asserted, however, that this is often not a helpful rule because its application involves definition of the phrase "new result," and this, it is said, opens the original difficulty.[78] Within a narrow definition, every new combination of elements gets a new result;[79] but this is not the sense in which the phrase is rightfully used as indicative of invention.[80] There must be a new result involving the exercise of the creative faculties.[81] As in other cases,[82] the fact that a combination produces a beneficial result never before attained may be evidence of invention,[83] but the fact of invention is not necessarily established by the fact that the combination obtains a better result.[84]

[§ 87] b. Novelty of Elements Immaterial. Where there is no direct anticipation,[85] invention is not negatived by the mere fact that some[86] or all[87] of the elements of the combination are old.

The question is whether they have been newly combined so as to effect new and useful results.[88] On the other hand, novelty in one or more of the separate elements does not justify a claim to the collection of those elements unless there is coaction between them producing a new result.[89] A combination is distinct from its separate elements.[90] The separate elements, if new, may be the subject of a patent,[91] or may be covered by claims in the same patent with the combination.[92]

[§ 88] 20. Aggregation. Aggregation is the mere bringing together of separate elements without changing the functions performed by them, or producing any result other than the added result of the separate operation of the elements.[93] In an aggregation there is a mere adding together of separate contributions, each operating independently of the other.[94] If the various elements coact with each other in a new and unitary organization so as to produce a different result from that produced by their separate operation, a combination results.[95] But if they do not so coact there is only aggregation.[96] A mere aggregation of old elements falls short of invention.[97] Mere superiority does not make aggregation patentable.[98] No one, by bringing together several old devices without producing a new and useful result, the joint product of the elements of the combination, and something more than an aggregate of old results, can acquire a right to prevent others from using the same devices, either singly or in other combinations, or, even if a new and useful result is obtained, can prevent others from using some of the devices, omitting others, in combination.[99] To escape being a mere aggregation it is essential that a different force or effect or result be produced in the combined method or device from that given by the separate parts or elements.[1]

1. Reckendorfer v. Faber, 92 U. S.

There must be a new result produced by their union.[2] A result must be produced which is not the mere aggregate of several results, each the complete product of one of the combined elements, but is due to the joint and coöperating activities of all of the elements.[3] That elements of the combination may usefully function separately, when not in combination, does not show mere aggregation.[4] It is not necessary that the action of the elements be simultaneous,[5] or that one or all of the constituent elements so enter into the combination as to coact all the time with all the others,[6] or change the mode of connection with every other.[7] It is sufficient if there be some joint operation performed by the elements producing a result due to their coöperative action.[8] Nor is it necessary that the mutual interaction of the elements should be constant;[9] the modification of one element by another during one of the successive steps of the unitary operation is sufficient.[10] It is not necessary that the coaction between the elements be direct.[11] It is sufficient if the coaction producing the unitary result comes through the mediation of an operator or the operating force.[12] A device designed for what is in a fair sense a unitary work does not become an aggregation merely because it involves successive steps under manual control.[13] But the manual use of a tool or an unattached movable device cannot be made an element of a combination claim,[14] nor can the material upon which a device operates.[15]

Multiplicity of elements. Unless a combination accomplishes some new result, a mere multiplicity of elements does not make it patentable.[16] Multiplicity of elements may go on indefinitely without creating a patentable combination unless, by their had theretofore been satisfied.[24] It is proper also to consider the condition of the trade, as well as the art to which the patent is allied.[25]

[§ 90] b. Novelty. The fact that the method or device in question accomplishes a result never before attempted or thought of is admissible to show that its production required the exercise of the inventive faculties.[26] The same is true of the fact that the materials employed were not so used before.[27]

[§ 91] c. Utility. While the mere attainment of desirable results is not invention,[28] the fact that a method or device produces a new and beneficial result, never attained before, is as a general rule evidence of invention,[29] and, where the other facts leave the question in doubt, may be sufficient to determine the doubt in favor of invention.[30] Thus evidence is admissible to show the increased efficiency of the method or device over those previously used for the same or analogous purposes.[31] The same is true with respect to its simplicity,[32] economy,[33] or other advantage over known methods or devices.[34] Proof of marked superiority over other methods or devices, however, is not conclusive evidence that its production involved invention,[35] even though coupled with proof of novelty.[36] Utility is allowed to turn the scale in favor of patentability only in those instances where the question whether the inventive faculty has been exercised is balanced with doubt and uncertainty.[37] It is of no value where the superior utility is dependent upon factors unconnected with the method or device itself, such as the efficiency of the methods pursued in its production,[38] the adaptability of the machinery,[39] or the skill of the workman employed in producing it.[40] Proof of utility is insufficient of itself to create a doubt as to invention.[41] It cannot serve both as creator and solver of doubt.[42]

[§ 92] d. Commercial Success. Commercial success attributable to the novelty and utility of the art or instrument in question is admissible to show that its production involved the exercise of the inventive faculties,[43] and, where the other facts leave the question in doubt, may be sufficient to resolve the doubt in favor of invention.[44] Increased weight is to be given to proof of commercial success where it is achieved in an old and crowded art;[45] where the existing means have for some time been unsatisfactory;[46] where prior efforts to fill the want supplied are shown;[47] or where the degree of success achieved is unusual.[48] Increased weight is also to be given such evidence where the alleged invention displaced either wholly or in a large degree methods or devices previously used for the same or analogous purposes,[49] especially if its acceptance in preference to the old methods or devices was immediate or prompt,[50] and unaided by puffing or business exploitation.[51] And the fact that earlier methods or devices for attaining the same or analogous purposes never went into general use enhances the weight to be given proof of acceptance and general use of the alleged invention.[52] Commercial success, however, is not in all cases controlling,[53] even though coupled with proof of superior utility;[54] and it has been asserted that commercial success must be scrutinized with the utmost caution before it is accepted as indicating invention,[55] and that commercial success alone is an unsafe guide,[56] especially where no prior efforts to fill the want satisfied are shown.[57] It must be weighed in the light of all the circumstances.[58] Commercial success is of no value as evidence where it clearly appears from other facts that the step taken by the patentee did not involve invention,[59]

and will be given weight only in doubtful cases.[60] To be entitled to consideration as evidence of invention, commercial success must result directly from the merit of the art or instrument and be attributable to the claims in suit.[61] It is of no evidential value where due entirely to good business methods,[62] efficient advertising,[63] the workmanship bestowed on the article,[64] the position of the manufacturer in the trade,[65] connection with another device,[66] cheapness[67] or beauty[68] of the product, popular demand for products of the same general kind or class,[69] or to any other circumstances peculiar to the course of trade.[70] The value of commercial success as an evidential fact is lessened by the fact that other circumstances contributed thereto,[71] but it may nevertheless have weight in doubtful cases,[72] especially where it surpassed that achieved by similar devices having all the other aids to success.[73] Obviously, evidence showing use by a large number of users is entitled to less weight than evidence of use by a large majority of users.[74] The burden of proof to show that commercial success was due to the method or device in question and not to other methods or devices used in connection with it is upon the one asserting it,[75] and the weight to be accorded evidence of commercial success is weakened by the absence of explanation of the part played by the other methods or devices.[76] The burden of proving that commercial success of a method or device which followed a long history of failure was due to advertising or exploitation is upon the party who challenges the inference of invention.[77]

Lack of commercial success. The fact that an art or instrument has achieved no success in the field of the practical art is a circumstance that may be considered in determining the question of invention.[78] But the fact that a patentee was not sufficiently satisfied that the manufacture of his device would be profitable to impel him to engage in efforts to interest the necessary capital to manufacture and push the invention has no substantial tendency to show that the device was not an invention.[79]

[§ 93] e. Satisfaction of Long Felt Want. Evidence of a long felt want and unsupplied need for means accomplishing the results of the patented art or instrument is admissible to show that its production called for an exercise of the inventive faculties.[80] It has been held, however, that such evidence is admissible only in doubtful cases.[81]

[§ 94] f. Unsuccessful Efforts of Others. The success of an art or instrument in meeting a general demand that others had tried unsuccessfully to supply is a true indication of invention,[82] and proof of prior successful efforts of others to accomplish the results obtained by the method or device in question is admissible to show that its production involved invention.[83] A thing is not obvious if the problem of attaining the result achieved by it long puzzled those skilled in the art to which it relates.[84] It has been held, however, that evidence of this character is admissible in doubtful cases only.[85] When success of a patented art or instrument follows a long history of failure, the burden of showing that success arose from some cause that had nothing to do with the difficulties of attaining the desired result is upon one challenging its validity on the ground that it lacks invention.[86]

[§ 95] g. Public Acquiescence in Validity. Long and continuous recognition of the validity of a patent by that part of the public interested in denying it is some evidence that the method or device patented is the product of invention.[87] Thus it may be shown that licenses have been taken out and royalties paid by those interested in making, using, or selling the method or device in question,[88] or that infringement has been discontinued on the failure to negotiate licenses.[89] The weight to be given to evidence of acquiescence is, of course, lessened if there are other patents within whose scope an infringement of the one in question would come.[90] It has been asserted that acquiescence in the validity of the patent as evidenced by the taking out of licenses and the payment of royalties is admissible upon the question of invention only in cases of doubt.[91] The mere fact that licenses have been taken out and paid has no value as evidence where lack of invention clearly appears.[92]

[§ 96] h. Imitation. The fact that a method or device has been copied or imitated by others after its disclosure is admissible to show that invention was involved in its production.[93]

[§ 97] i. Experimentation. The fact that a series of experiments was required before the result was arrived at may be evidence of invention.[94] Such evidence, it has been asserted, raises a strong inference that the result was not obvious but constituted a real addition to public knowledge.[95] But for such experiments to have much value as evidence it is essential that the patentee should have started his experiments with knowledge of the state of the art.[96] Evidence of experiments has no weight on the question of invention if they have enabled the experimenter to disclose only what was already known.[97] Increased weight is given evidence of experimentation by proof that the method or device in question promptly came into general use, displacing other methods or devices previously used.[98] But every result obtained by deliberate reflection and experimentation with well-known appliances, or parts thereof, is not necessarily invention,[99] and evidence of the difficulties encountered by the alleged inventor will be permitted to turn the scale in favor of invention only where the issue is otherwise in doubt.[1]

[§ 98] j. Expert Opinion. The opinion of persons who by reason of professional, scientific, or technical training, or practical experience, may be regarded as experts in the particular art to which the method or device relates, may be received on the issue whether the exercise of invention was required for its production.[2] It has been asserted that a defense of lack of invention should be supported by the testimony of expert witnesses where the patent relates to a complex subject.[3]

[§ 99] k. Independent Production by Others. The existence of inventive genius may be negatived by proof that different mechanics when confronted with the same problem solved it in the same way, even though that way may be a novel one.[4] But the fact that another mechanic offered a somewhat similar solution does not conclusively negative invention.[5] It is a fact to be taken into consideration together with all the other factors in the case.[6] The mere fact that an infringing structure was produced without knowledge of the patentee's disclosure does not negative invention.[7] The infringing structure may itself have been the product of inventive ingenuity.[8]

[§ 100] F. Designs—1. In General. By virtue of express statutory provision,[9] any person who has invented any new, original, and ornamental design for an article of manufacture, not known or used by others in this country before his invention thereof, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention thereof, may obtain a patent therefor upon compliance with the regulations and conditions applicable to obtaining patents.[10] To be patentable, however, a design must be new,[11] original,[12] ornamental,[13] and the result of invention.[14] Generally speaking, the law relating to such patents does not materially differ from that which governs as to mechanical patents,[15] and all the regulations and provisions which apply to the obtaining and protection of patents for inventions or discoveries not inconsistent with those dealing specifically with design patents are made applicable to them.[16] As in the case of mechanical patents,[17] there springs from the grant of a design patent a presumption of validity,[18] and the burden of proving invalidity is upon him who asserts it.[19] But the fact of such grant does not of itself give binding legal force to claims for patentability.[20]

The object of the statutes authorizing patents for designs is to encourage the decorative arts;[21] the origination of objects which give pleasure through the sense of sight.[22]

[§ 101] 2. Novelty and Anticipation. To be patentable, a design must be new.[23] An invention of a design is anticipated if it was known or used in this country prior to the inventor's invention or discovery thereof,[24] or if it was patented[25] or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country[26] before his invention thereof. As in the case of mechanical inventions,[27] a design is not anticipated, however, merely because the same design was known or used in this country, or had been patented or described in a printed publication here or abroad before the date upon which the inventor obtained a patent.[28] In order that a design may be anticipated it is essential that what was known or used, patented, or described in a printed publication should be substantially identical with it in appearance.[29] The test is the effect that the design produces, visualized by the ordinary observer giving such attention as a purchaser usually gives.[30] In determining the sameness of effect upon the eye of the observer, the viewpoint of the expert is inapplicable,[31] although expert testimony with respect to the effect imparted to the ordinary observer may be received.[32] Two designs are substantially identical if such a person would mistake one for the other;[33] but not otherwise.[34] Anticipation is not avoided merely because the later design can be distinguished from the earlier one.[35] Differences in detail and in nonessential matters will not confer novelty where the designs are so much alike that an ordinary observer might readily mistake one for the other.[36] A design is not anticipated merely because each of its elements considered separately is old.[37] It is sufficient if the design as a whole produces a new impression upon the eye of the ordinary observer.[38] There is nothing new about a design if it is a mere copy of an old form, whether natural[39] or artificial.[40] However, the mere fact that a natural product is suggestive of a design does not show want of novelty.[41]

Prior patents to same inventor. As in the case of mechanical patents,[42] a prior patent for a design is not deprived of effect as an anticipation by the fact that it was granted to the inventor of the later design.[43]

Anticipatory mechanical patents. A design may be anticipated by the disclosures contained in a prior mechanical patent.[44]

A design which has been copyrighted cannot also be patented.[45]

Oral evidence of prior use. Where prior use of a design is sought to be established by oral testimony only, the proof sustaining it must be clear, satisfactory, and beyond a reasonable doubt.[46]

[§ 102] 3. Originality. To be patentable, a design must be original.[47] The words "new" and "original" are not synonymous.[48] A design may be new in the novelty sense, as a specific design, and yet possess nothing of what is termed "originality."[49] To be "original" a design must impart to the mind of the observer a sense of uniqueness and character.[50] The essence of the thought intended to be conveyed by the word "original" is of something originated—of something created,[51] that is, having its primary conception in the mind of the inventor.[52] Originality is, among other things, the converse of the common-place and of the stereotyped.[53]

[§ 103] 4. Ornamentality. The present statute dealing with designs authorizes the grant of a patent to the inventor of a new, original, and ornamental design.[54] An invented design, in addition to being new[55] and original,[56] must be ornamental.[57] The design must render the article to which it is applied pleasing, attractive, and beautiful.[58] No design patent can be obtained for a thing that is plainly utilitarian, presenting no pleasing or ornamental effect to the eye.[59] Something must be exhibited which appeals to the æsthetic faculty of the observer.[60] It is not enough that the device may be arresting, and hence desirable for advertising purposes.[61] A design patent cannot be obtained to protect a mechanical function[62] or to cover an article whose configuration affects its utility alone.[63] Nor can a design patent be obtained merely for the purpose of identifying an article of manufacture, thereby in effect operating as a trade-mark.[64] It is not necessary that the article of manufacture to which the design is applied should have been made for the purpose of ornament.[65] Nor is it a fatal objection that the design itself is exhibited upon a mechanical product devoted to utilitarian purposes.[66] It is sufficient that a useful article has been made in such a way as to make it ornamental.[67] But the invention must relate to the design and be distinguishable from that which contrived the mechanical product for commercial purposes.[68] If the article was not intended for display but merely for an obscure use, no patent can be obtained.[69] But while expression has been given to a contrary view,[70] it has been held to be immaterial that the novel element in a design is visible only when the article to which it pertains is not being used for the purpose for which the article, as distinguished from the design, was intended.[71] A design is ornamental if it imparts a pleasing, attractive impression to the eye.[72] It is not necessary that the design should be a work of the fine arts,[73] or that it should impart a pleasing impression to the eyes of artists[74] or experts in design.[75] The test is an affirmative answer to the question: Does the design impart a pleasing impression to the eyes of ordinary persons?[76] A design, to be patentable, need not be useful in the popular sense.[77] Utility in a design depends upon the pleasing effect imparted to the eye, and not upon any new function.[78] It was not otherwise under an earlier form of the statute in which the word "useful" appeared and the word "ornamental" did not.[79] It was held that the word "useful" was inserted merely to indicate that things which were vicious and had a tendency to corrupt were not to be the subject of a patent.[80]

Commercial success is some indication that a design is ornamental.[81]

[§ 104] 5. Invention. The exercise of the inventive faculty is just as essential to the validity of a design patent as it is to that for any other kind.[82] The inventor must have done something which the

"The amendment of May 9, 1902, to section 4929 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Comp. St. 1916, § 9475), provides that any person who has invented any new, original, and ornamental design for an article of manufacture may, subject to certain conditions and limitations stated in the statute, obtain a patent therefor. The original section 4929 provided that any person who, by his own industry, genius, efforts, and expense, had invented and produced any new and original design, etc., should, under certain limitations, be protected. The amended section differs from the original section in using the word 'ornamental' to specify and characterize the features which every design must have, and in omitting the word 'useful' from its enumeration. But the presence of usefulness did not impart patentability to a design, and the absence of usefulness did not take patentability from it." Goudy v. Hansen, supra.

ordinary person skilled in the art would not know how to do, if occasion for it arose.[83] No patent can be obtained for a design within the range of the ordinary routine observer[84] or designer.[85] While it has been said that a design patent must relate to subject matter comparatively trivial,[86] bringing into play a different set of faculties from those required in producing other classes of inventions,[87] and that courts have looked with greater leniency upon them than upon patents for other inventions,[88] it has also been asserted that design patents require as high a degree of exercise of the inventive or original faculty as utility patents.[89] Something more than ordinary skill in arrangement of common features must be exercised.[90] No design patent should be granted for "every shadow of a shade of an idea."[91] The test of invention is the same as for mechanical patents.[92] There must be present a creative mental conception, as distinguished from the ordinary faculties of reasoning upon the materials supplied by a special knowledge, and the facility of manipulation which results from its habitual and intelligent practice.[93] The state of the art and the room left for invention when the design was produced must be considered in respect of both.[94] Mere mechanical skill is not sufficient.[95] Where the peculiarities of an applicant's design do not rise to the dignity of invention, the design is not patentable, although the peculiarities are such as to prevent the design from being regarded in the trade as a substitute for a design already patented.[96] In determining whether invention was required to produce a design the change in the appearance of the article as an entirety is to be considered,[97] and not merely the change in the elements which create the changed appearance.[98] Invention may reside in a new combination of old elements,[99] or in the adaptation of old devices or forms to new purposes.[1] But there is no invention if no more is involved than the exercise of mere mechanical skill in assembling the old elements,[2] or in selecting and adapting the old forms and devices to the new use.[3] Invention is not negatived by the mere fact that the design is simple,[4] or by the mere fact that it does not show a wide departure from other designs.[5]

dicated by commercial success of the design,[7] or by its widespread use.[8] But they are never determinative of the fact of invention.[9] It is only in doubtful cases that they alone are sufficient to turn the scale in favor of invention.[10]

[§ 105] G. Loss of Right To Obtain Patent—1. In General. A person who has invented or discovered a new and useful method or device not known or used by others in this country before his invention or discovery thereof, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof, may lose the right to obtain a patent therefor either by failure to make timely application,[11] or by conduct amounting to abandonment.[12]

[§ 106] 2. Failure To Make Timely Application—a. Inventions Patented or Described in Printed Publications—(1) In General. Congress has in express terms limited the inventions for which a patent may be obtained by an inventor to those "not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country . . . more than two years prior to his application."[13] To bar the right of an inventor to obtain a patent by reason of this provision, it is essential that the earlier patent should have issued more than two years before the later application,[14] and that what was in use or on sale more than two years prior to the application be identical in substance with the invention claimed.[15] The issuance of a patent during the two years immediately preceding the application has no such effect.[16] No distinction exists with respect to this matter between an original and a later or divisional application.[17] The right of a sole inventor to obtain a patent is not barred by a prior patent issued more than two years prior to his application, but not more than two years before the date of a joint application filed by mistake by the sole inventor and another.[18] The subsequent application in such case is properly considered as a continuation of the earlier joint application.[19] Identity in substance is all that is required.[20] The right of an inventor to obtain a patent is barred if the difference between the method or device for which a patent is sought and the method or device which was the subject of prior public use or sale is only such as would suggest itself to any person skilled in the art to which the invention relates.[21] The effect of the statute is not avoided by the fact that alterations are made where the principle of the organization and operation of the invention is not changed or affected.[22] Identity of substance does not mean that the machine embodying it must have been perfect, but merely that it shall be sufficiently perfect to be practically applied to its intended purpose.[23] The mere fact that an invention has been improved since its original embodiment does not demonstrate that it was embryonic or incomplete.[24] Questions relating to when an invention is patented or described in any printed publication within the meaning of the statute are discussed elsewhere in this article.[25]

[§ 107] (2) Inventions Previously Patented Abroad. Congress has provided that, where the invention for which a patent is sought was first patented or caused to be patented by the inventor or his legal repesentatives or assigns in a foreign country, no patent shall be granted in this country if the application for the foreign patent was filed more than twelve months prior to the filing of the application in this country, in the case of mechanical patents, or more than four months, in the case of design patents.[26] Earlier statutes fixed different periods within which the application had to be filed.[27] In order that the right to obtain a patent may be barred by failure to make application within the time fixed by statute, the invention patented abroad must be the same as the invention for which application is made here.[28] Thus, while the right to obtain a patent for a product may be barred by the fact that a patent for the process used as the means of creating and developing it had been obtained in a foreign country beyond the time made permissible by the statute, if the patent describes the product,[29] the right is not barred where the process described in the foreign patent is incapable of producing the product for which the United States patent is sought.[30] Nor is the right barred by a foreign patent which discloses, but does not claim, the invention.[31] The time of fil-

[a] Retrospective operation.—Act Congr. March 3, 1903 (32 U. S. St. at L. 1225, c 1019), extending the time from seven to twelve months within which an application must be filed in this country, after the filing of a foreign application for the same invention, does not operate retroactively, and therefore does not apply to applications pending at the date of its passage. 27. Act March 3, 1839 (5 St. at L. 353) (six months); Act March 3, 1897 (29 St. at L. 692) (seven months).

[a] Retrospective operation.—The act of March 3, 1897 by its terms became effective Jan. 1, 1898, and had no application to patents granted prior to that date. Rubber Tire Wheel Co. v. Davie, 100 Fed. 85.

[b] Under Act July 8, 1870 (16 U. S. St. at L. 201), an existing foreign patent issued to the same inventor did not bar the right to a patent unless the invention had been in public use in this country for more than two years prior to the date of making application here. 31. General Electric Co. v. Alex-

ing an application in the British patent office must be taken as the date of the application for a foreign patent within the meaning of the statute, given though such application was accompanied only by a provisional specification.[32] It is immaterial in such case that the invention was not fully disclosed until the complete specification was filed.[33] An inventor is not debarred from obtaining a patent by virtue of the provisions of the statute by the fact that some intermeddler has previously caused his invention to be patented in a foreign country.[34]

[§ 108] b. Inventions in Public Use or on Sale[35] —(1) In General. Congress has further limited the inventions for which a patent may be obtained by an inventor to those "not in public use or on sale in this country for more than two years prior to his application."[36] If an invention has been in public use or on sale in this country more than two years prior to the application the right to obtain a patent is lost.[37] The fact that the inventor did not intend to abandon his right to a patent is immaterial in such cases,[38] as is also the fact that he was prevented from making an earlier application by causes beyond his control.[39] In order that the right to obtain a patent may be barred by the fact that the invention was in public use or on sale, it must have been in public use or on sale earlier than two years before the application.[40] The fact that the invention was in pub-

[a] "The purpose of these provisions was and is to compel an inventor who seeks the monopoly afforded by the patent statutes to act with promptitude. An inventor who has regard for his invention will not delay applying for protection. The laws give him ample time. If he permit the public to use that which he has invented and stand by for years while they use it, he loses the right to take it back from the public. If he chooses to sell the machine embodying his invention without the protection of a patent, it will be presumed that he does not desire it. The exclusive privileges given by the patent laws are coupled with the corresponding obligations to rely upon those laws and to seek their protection early." National Cash Register Co. v. American Cash Register Co., 178 Fed. 79, 81, 101 CCA 569.

[a] Under earlier statutes authorizing the grant of a patent only for an invention which had not been used before the application was made, an inventor could not obtain a patent for lic use or on sale during the two years immediately preceding the application has no such effect;[41] nor does the fact that it was in public use or on sale in the intermediate time between the application and the grant of the patent.[42] The use or sale of the invention need not, however, have been continued during the two-year period.[43] The phrase "for more," as used in the statute, is to be understood as if the language were "earlier than two years prior," or as if "for" were omitted.[44] If the invention was in public use or on sale more than two years prior to the application, it is immaterial that no use or sale occurred during the two years immediately preceding the application.[45] The inventor cannot relieve himself of the consequences of prior public use of his invention by assigning an interest in his invention to the person by whom the invention was used.[46] Insanity of the inventor does not stop the running of the two-year period.[47]

Design patents. The statute is applicable to designs as well as to mechanical inventions.[48]

[§ 109] (2) Inventions in Public Use or on Sale Abroad. The prohibition of the present statute is limited in express terms to inventions in public use or on sale "in this country" more than two years prior to the date of application.[49] An earlier statute did not contain any restriction as to the place or country of use or placing on sale,[50] but it was held that congress had by other provisions manifested an intent to limit the restrictive effect of the statute to a use or sale in this country.[51]

[§ 110] (3) Application Date—(a) In General. In determining whether an invention has been in public use or on sale more than two years prior to the application for a patent, the date upon which the application is filed or otherwise made is controlling.[52] The date upon which the application, considered as an instrument, was executed is immaterial.[53]

[§ 111] (b) Successive Applications. Where an application is one which may properly be considered as a substitute for, and continuation of, a prior application, the original filing date controls in determining whether the invention was in public use or on sale beyond the time permitted by statute.[54] The continuity of two applications is a question of fact, to be determined by the circumstances of each case.[55] An application cannot be considered as a substitute for, or continuation of, an earlier application where it claims a different invention.[56] Nor can an application be considered as a continuation of an earlier abandoned application.[57]

Divisional applications. In the absence of laches, estoppel, or intervening rights, a divisional application relates back to the original from which it is carved, and questions with respect to prior use or sale of the invention claimed by it are to be determined with reference to the date of the original application.[58] But, of course, where the right to have the application considered as a continuance of the original application is lost by laches, estoppel, or intervening rights, the date of the later application controls.[59] Where a patent has issued on an application amended in conformity to a ruling of the patent office so as to exclude one of two inventions originally claimed, a subsequent application seeking a patent for the invention not claimed in the amended application cannot be regarded as a divisional application giving applicant the benefit of the filing date his invention if it was known or used at any time, however short, before his application. Andrews v. Hovey, 123 U. S. 267, 8 SCt 101, 31 L. ed. 160; Manning v. Cape Ann Isinglass, etc., Co., 108 U. of the earlier application.[60]

Renewal of application forfeited for failure to pay final fee. Where a timely application is made for the issuance of a patent allowed on an earlier application, but withheld for nonpayment of the final fee within the time prescribed, the filing date of the original application controls in determining whether the invention was in public use or on sale beyond the time fixed by the statute.[61] But to obtain the benefit of the original date, the renewal must be in accordance with the terms of the law.[62]

[§ 112] (c) Inventions Previously Applied for Abroad. Congress has expressly provided that an application, filed in this country by any person who has previously filed an application for a patent for the same invention, discovery, or design in a foreign country which by treaty, convention, or law affords similar privileges to citizens of the United States, shall have the same force and effect as the same application would have if filed in this country on the date on which the application was first filed in such foreign country, provided the application in this country is filed within four months, in cases of designs, from the earliest date on which any such foreign application was filed, and within twelve months, in other cases.[63]

[§ 113] (4) Nature and Extent of Use—(a) In General. Any use of the complete and operative invention in its natural and intended way is a use in public within the meaning of the statute,[64] provided the use was not merely experimental,[65] and was not a secret use by the inventor or others under his direction and control.[66] Where the use was neither experimental nor secret, the fact that it was by the inventor himself is immaterial.[67] This is so, even though the inventor derived no profit from the use of the invention.[68] Whether the use of an invention is public or private does not necessarily depend upon the number of persons to whom its use is known.[69] The phrase "public use" does not mean use by the public generally.[70] An invention may be in public use, even though the use and knowledge of the use is confined to one person.[71] To constitute the public use of an invention it is not necessary that more than one of the devices should be publicly used.[72] A single use is just as effectual as many to bar the right to a patent.[73]

[§ 114] (b) Experimental Use. Use of an invention by or under the control of the inventor for the purpose of determining whether the invention is complete or requires modification or change before final adoption does not place the invention in public use within the meaning of the statute.[74] This is true, even though the invention upon experiment prove complete.[75] It is immaterial that such use was in public.[76] To come within this rule the main purpose of the use must be to enable the inventor to determine whether the invention is complete, or requires modification or change before final adoption.[77] The rule has no application where such purpose is merely incidental or subsidiary to some other purpose.[78] Thus the rule has no application where the invention is placed in use for the sole purpose of satisfying the public that the method or device is adapted to meet a public want,[79] or where the use, although originally for the purpose of experiment, is continued for a longer period than is reasonably necessary to determine whether the invention is complete or requires further modification or change.[80] In determining the proper extent of experimental use the subject matter of the invention is to be considered.[81] A use mainly for the purpose of trade and profit and incidentally for experiment is within the prohibition of the statute,[82] but the mere fact that, as incident to the use of a method or device for the purpose of experiment, the inventor derives some profit does not render the invention in public use within the meaning of the statute.[83] The mere fact that the product of the method or device was in public use or on sale does not establish that the use was not experimental.[84] To come within the protection of the rule under consideration the ex-

"Invention, in so far as it relates to machines, may, for the purposes of illustration, be divided into two general classes: First, where the invention is the result of a happy creative thought; and, second, where it is developed by arduous and patient toil. To the first class belong the safety lamp and the driven well; to the second the 'Linotype' and the typewriter. The moment the idea of surrounding the lamp with wire gauze occurred to Davy and its practicability was demonstrated by a simple test, the invention stood revealed. Mergenthaler, on the other hand, was not rewarded so much for the inspiration and originality of his idea as for the ingenuity and skill with which he built up his intricate and marvelous machine. The invention of Knibbs belongs to the first class. Undoubtedly his conception showed the genius of the inventor as distinguished from that of the mechanic. It did not, however, require a long series of laborious experiments to prove its efficacy. As soon as the two sections of the pump were connected by a hole on the inside or a tube on the outside and satisfactory tests demonstrated that the old difficulties were thus obviated, the invention was in a condition for patenting." Eastman v. New York, supra.

"A clear distinction must be drawn between the experimental use allowed of a machine sought to be patented, designed to produce articles, and that of a mere patented article itself, designed for general use or consumption. In the latter case, a presumption arises that, when the inventor issues to the public the article, he regards it as a finished product, and, in case he does not apply for patent within two years after, abandonment of his purpose to so do may well be assumed. In the case of a machine designed to manufacture articles, on the contrary, reason and common experience teach us that in most cases such machine will not come at once a perfect product from the first castings. Almost inexplicable defects will generally be found to mar the perfect operation. These defects must frequently be remedied, often by long study and much experimentation. The article itself may be produced by the machine in perfect state or nearly so, yet not quickly, effectively, and practically by reason of the defects in the machine. It seems to me that it would not be in accord with equity and sound sense to say that such produced articles must not be used, but needlessly destroyed in order to save the inventor from the charge of prior public use of the machine. Sale of the product of such machine may, in a secondary sense, be considered profit derived from the machine; but a fair construction of the principles of the law, it seems to me, should and does require that such profits should be derived in the primary sense from the sale of the periments conducted must be for the purpose of testing and perfecting the invention claimed.[85] If a device has passed the experimental stage its use thereafter is a "public use," even though the machine or combination of which it is an element had not passed the stage of experiment.[86]

[§ 115] (c) Secret Use. It has been said that the phrase "public use" means use in public as distinguished from secret use,[87] and expression has been given to the view that a secret use by the inventor does not affect his right to obtain a patent, regardless of the duration of such use unless another in the meantime has made the invention and secured the exclusive right to make, use, and vend it by patent.[88] This general proposition, however, has no application to cases of deliberate delay.[89] A use is not strictly secret where one or more persons are permitted to witness the invention in operation without pledge of secrecy,[90] or even if they might have seen it had they used their opportunity.[91] The persons who witness the use need not understand or appreciate the invention's method of operation,[92] or be interested in practicing it.[93] Nor is it essential that they be skilled in the art to which the invention relates.[94] If an inventor uses or permits his invention to be used without restriction of any kind, the use is a public one, even though the thing embodying the invention was hidden from view while in use.[95]

[§ 116] (d) Consent of Inventor. Early statutes authorized the grant of a patent only for an invention which had not been known or used before the application was made.[96] Prior knowledge or use, however, was held to be operative as a bar only where the use was with the consent and allowance of the inventor.[97] In a later statute this limitation was made in express terms.[98] In a subsequent statute the clause containing the limitation was omitted,[99] and it does not appear in the present statute.[1] Notwithstanding the omission of this limitation, some of the earlier decisions were to the effect that if the right to a patent was to be barred the use must be with the knowledge and consent of the inventor,[2] but it is now settled that public use may bar the right to a patent regardless of whether it was with the inventor's knowledge, consent, or allowance,[3] except where knowledge of the invention was fraudulently, surreptitiously, or piratically obtained.[4] It has been asserted that the question what constitutes a "fraudulent," "surreptitious," or "piratical" use has been left in obscurity by the authorities,[5] but it is entirely clear that, when courts have used these words in patent cases, they intended them to apply to acts done mala fide, clandestinely, treacherously, and by means of falsehood, fraud, or breach of trust.[6] It is equally clear that they have never been used to characterize knowledge obtained openly in the due course of business,[7] or applied to an act which is neither malum prohibitum nor malum in se.[8] Use without the knowledge or consent of the inventor is not fraudulent, surreptitious, or piratical merely because the user, under no injunction of secrecy, derived his knowledge from the inventor.[9] It has been so held even where the knowledge was obtained in using the invention in experiments at the request of the inventor.[10]

[§ 117] (5) On Sale—(a) In General. An invention ready to be delivered to any purchaser as a complete and perfect method or device fit to be used without modification or change is on sale when the method or device is sold or offered for sale,[11] provided it is sold or offered for sale without any right machine itself before the inventor should be barred by this defense." Bryce Bros. Co. v. Seneca Glass Co., supra.

[a] Where the inventor for pay of experimentation or substitution being reserved.[12] A single unrestricted sale is sufficient to constitute the invention on sale.[13] That the invention is sold embraced in another without notice does not deprive the statutory provision of effect.[14] The statute does not require a "sale" but only a placing "on sale."[15] A completed sale, either with or without delivery, is not necessary.[16] If the art or instrument embodying the invention is on hand ready to be delivered to any purchaser, it is on sale if offered for sale without restriction, even though no actual sale is made.[17] But the combination of words used in the statute indicates that the sale contemplated is such as creates an opportunity for present public use.[18] The method or device must have existed as a complete article of sale, not on paper, but in fact,[19] and if it is not on hand and ready for delivery the invention cannot be said to be on sale within the meaning of the act.[20] This is true, even though the invention has passed the experimental stage and is complete,[21] even though it has been advertised for sale,[22] and even though a contract for sale and delivery has been made.[23] But where some articles have in fact been manufactured and delivered more than two years prior to the application, the right to obtain a patent is lost, even though the articles were not made until after they were ordered.[24] If an inventor sells his invention, the fact that the device embodying the invention was hidden from view while in use does not deprive the sale of its effect as a bar to his right to obtain a patent.[25]

An assignment of the right to secure a patent is not placing the invention on sale.[26]

[§ 118] (b) Experimental Sales. There may be an actual sale without placing the invention on sale within the meaning of the law where the sale is primarily for the purpose of securing an adequate test of the invention.[27] A sale which, although otherwise complete, reserves to the inventor a right of experimentation and substitution does not place the invention "on sale."[28] But the main purpose of the sale must be to enable the inventor to determine whether the invention is complete or requires further modification or change before final adoption.[29] There is a clear distinction between sales for the purpose of testing the market and sales to test the invention itself. The former is a trader's and not an inventor's experiment and does not carve an exception out of the statute.[30] To bring a use or sale within the exception made in favor of experimental use or sale there must be evidence both of the need and the fact of experimentation.[31] A sale is not teaches others to use the invention, it is public use. International Tooth-Crown Co. v. Gaylord, 140 U. S. 55, 11 SCt 716, 35 L. ed. 347.

[b] Sale made for purpose of defeating rights of creditors.—Although an inventor transferred by formal bill of sale an experimental machine, merely for the purpose of defeating his creditors, he cannot, where a patent subsequently issued was questioned on the ground of prior use, contend, for the purpose of defeating the rights of the public, that the bill of sale was in reality a mortgage. experimental merely because what the purchaser got was imperfect and subsequently greatly improved,[32] or merely because the inventor regarded the method or device sold as incomplete or experimental.[33] Nor is a sale experimental merely because the purchaser is allowed a period of use after delivery, in which to determine whether the invention will satisfactorily meet his requirements.[34] Whether a sale was primarily for experimental purposes is a question of fact.[35] That the sale was principally for the purpose of experimentation must be evidenced by some affirmation of the fact,[36] or by some act from which it may be inferred.[37] A secret purpose to test the invention is not sufficient.[38] Failure to follow up and watch the performance of the method or device may be considered in determining whether a sale was in fact experimental.[39] But the mere fact that the inventor inspected the device sold from time to time does not prove the sale to be experimental.[40] If an inventor gets the manufacturers to make a machine for him, with which he may experiment and test his invention, the transaction does not make the invention "on sale" at the moment of delivery of the machine, even though, as between the parties, it is a sale.[41] It is not otherwise if the inventor takes in a partner in the ownership of the machine.[42]

[§ 119] (6) Evidence. Whether an invention was in public use or on sale and for a longer period than permissible under the statute is a question of fact.[43] It may be established by the testimony of a single witness.[44] Where a patent has issued to an inventor, the burden of proof on the issue of public use or sale is upon the party assailing the right of the inventor to a patent.[45] This burden must be sustained by the clearest proof,[46]—proof characterized by some courts as sufficiently clear to satisfy beyond reasonable doubt.[47] The evidence must so satisfy not alone as to the time,[48] but also as to the identity of the thing in public use or on sale with the invention subsequently claimed.[49] As a general proposition, mere oral evidence, depending upon the memory of the witness or witnesses, should be corroborated by contemporary records or memoranda, physical exhibits, or definitely proved circumstances.[50] This, however, is not an inflexible rule.[51] Oral testimony, although lacking such corroboration, may be so definite and specific as to satisfy a court beyond a reasonable doubt that the invention was in public use or on sale beyond the permissible period.[52]

"Experimental use is of two sorts: (1) In order to enable the inventor to test the practicability or utility of his invention, and to prove and perfect the same. Experiments of this sort cannot, in the nature of things, always be made by an inventor alone, but must sometimes be carried out by placing the invented article in the hands of others. A use solely for experiment of this sort to satisfy the inventor, and, perhaps, as Judge Lowell suggests, to satisfy some one from whom the inventor hopes to receive aid in patenting the invention, is not deemed a public use, within the meaning of the statute. (2) In order to satisfy the public that the article invented is adapted to meet a public need. To secure public favor for the invention, the inventor commonly desires to secure, even at some pecuniary sacrifice, a considerable amount of this sort of experimental use, but, in my opinion, an experiment of this sort, when carried out by means of an unrestricted sale to and unrestricted use by a stranger, is not the less a public use, within the meaning of the statute." that a use or sale was not experimental;[53] and where an actual use or sale beyond the two-year period is proved by evidence sufficiently clear, the party seeking to sustain the patent has the burden of producing evidence to establish that such use or sale was primarily or principally experimental,[54] and this fact must be established by evidence that is full, clear, unequivocal, and convincing.[55] It being once shown, however, that the use was experimental, then, upon the question of its reasonableness in point of duration, every presumption should be made in favor of the inventor.[56]

[§ 120] 3. Abandonment—a. In General. The statute granting to an inventor the right to obtain a patent for his invention expressly excludes inventions proved to have been abandoned.[57] An invention may be abandoned at any time before or after application;[58] and the right to obtain a patent once abandoned cannot be resumed.[59] The inventor may make his application within two years of any public use or sale in this country or the publication of any patent or description in a printed publication, and yet, if within that period he has relinquished all claim to his discovery, his right to obtain a patent is lost.[60] The benefit of the abandonment, however, inures to the public and not to a later inventor.[61] Abandonment to the public is not confined to reissues, but the statute applies to all patents.[62]

Design patents. The right to obtain a patent for a design may be lost by abandonment.[63]

[§ 121] b. What Constitutes Abandonment—(1) In General. Abandonment occurs where the inventor voluntarily relinquishes his inchoate right to secure a patent and dedicates the invention to the free and unlimited use of the public.[64] Whether or not an invention has been abandoned is a question of fact.[65] In determining whether an invention has been abandoned the intention of the inventor governs.[66] The intention of the inventor to abandon the invention may be expressly declared,[67] or it may be implied from conduct inconsistent with an intention to claim a patent.[68] A person is sometimes said to have abandoned his invention when he gives up the idea; relinquishes the intention of perfecting his idea, so that another may take up the same thing and become the original and first inventor.[69] But an invention can be abandoned, within the meaning of the statutory provision under consideration, only when the invention is complete and operative, and available for immediate use.[70] Abandonment of experiments upon an incomplete and imperfect invention is not a dedication of the complete and operative invention to the public.[71] Description of the invention in a printed publication bars the right to obtain a patent for it if the publication was made more than two years before the application,[72] but abandonment is not to be inferred from the mere fact that the inventor described the invention in a printed publication before making application for a patent.[73] Mere delay in applying for a patent is not abandonment,[73½] but an inventor may forfeit his right to obtain a patent by a willful or negligent postponement of his claims,[73⅛] or by otherwise attempting to withhold the benefit of his invention from the public until a similar or the same invention should have been made and introduced by others.[73¼] This is sometimes called "abandonment," although there is in fact no intention on the part of the inventor to relinquish his inchoate rights to the public.[73⅜] Mere forbearance to apply for a patent during the progress of experiments looking to the perfection of the invention affords no ground for inferring abandonment;[73⅜] nor is abandonment to be inferred from delay in making an application where the delay is due entirely to the poverty of the inventor.[73½]

Mere nonuser is not abandonment.[74]

[§ 122] (2) Acquiescence in Public Use. An intent to abandon the right to obtain a patent for an invention may be inferred from the conduct of the inventor in permitting the invention to be placed in public use or on sale under circumstances denoting an intention on his part to dedicate it to the public.[75] And, of course, no patent can be obtained for an invention if it was in public use or on sale in this country more than two years before the application.[76] But the mere fact that the inventor permitted the invention to be in public use or on sale before making application for a patent does not of itself show an intention to abandon the right to a patent.[77]

[a] Reason for rule.—"If an inventor should be permitted to hold back from the knowledge of the public the secrets of his invention; if he should, for a long period of years, retain the monopoly, and make and sell his invention publicly, and thus gather the whole profits of it, relying upon his superior skill and knowledge of the structure; and then, and then only, when the danger of competition should force him to secure the exclusive right, he should be allowed to take out a patent, and thus exclude the public from any further use than what would be derived under it, during his fourteen years; it would materially retard the progress of science and the useful arts, and give a premium to those who should be least prompt to communicate their discoveries." Pennock v. Dialogue, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 19, 7 L. ed. 327.

The intention to abandon must be expressed,[78] or necessarily implied from the circumstances of the case.[79] Such an inference can arise only where the inventor had knowledge of the use.[80] Knowledge on his part, however, may be inferred from circumstances.[81] An inventor is not to be considered as having dedicated his invention to the public because he licensed a few persons to use it for the purpose of ascertaining its utility,[82] or by permitting any use consistent with an intention to claim the exclusive privilege of making, selling, or using the invention.[83]

An invention patented under the statute remitting payment of any fee, where applicant expressly states in his application that the invention described therein, if patented, may be used by the government or any of its officers or employees in the prosecution of work for the government, or by any person in the United States, without the payment to him of any royalty thereon,[84] is abandoned so far as the right to protection in this country is concerned.[85] Abandonment does not occur, however, unless the patent was granted under the statute.[86] Thus one who has made application thereunder is not held to have dedicated the invention to the public where he amends his application before issuance of the patent by withdrawing the stipulation for public use.[87]

[§ 123] (3) Failure To Claim Disclosures at Prior Application. Where an inventor makes an application for a patent for an invention and claims certain specific inventions, but fails to claim other inventions which are fully disclosed in the application, it will be presumed that he intended to abandon the right to obtain a patent for the invention which he omitted to claim,[88] unless the unclaimed invention is separate and distinct from the invention claimed.[89] The presumption, however, is rebutted if the patentee has another application pending in the patent office claiming it,[90] or if he files such application promptly.[91] Matter erased from one application and presented in a second after grant of a patent is not abandoned.[92] Acceptance of a patent with claims narrowed to exclude matter cited by the patent office as an anticipation is an abandonment thereof to the public;[93] and one who retires from an interference proceeding and withdraws his claim for the specific element forming the subject of the interference is thereafter precluded from claiming such element under his patent.[94]

[§ 124] (4) Abandonment of Application. A party may abandon a particular application for a patent without abandoning the intent to secure a patent at some time and therefore without abandoning the invention claimed therein. He may file a subsequent application and secure a patent.[95] There may be abandonment of an invention to the public, however, as well after an application has been rejected or withdrawn as before any application is made.[96] An intention so to abandon may be inferred either from express declarations of the inventor,[97] or by conduct inconsistent with any other conclusion,[98] such as the omission of the inventor, without substantial reason or excuse, to take any step to reinstate or renew his application for a long period of time.[99] Intention on the part of the inventor to abandon his invention is not to be inferred from delay in prosecuting his claim in the patent office if action is taken within the time fixed by law.[1] Nor is abandonment to be inferred from delay in prosecuting a rejected claim where the delay is due to circumstances beyond the inventor's control,[2] including the rules of the patent office,[3] extreme poverty,[4] or protracted illness.[5] The right to obtain a patent for a process is not affected by abandonment of an application for a patent for a machine for practicing the process;[6] nor is the right to obtain a patent for a process affected by abandonment of an application for a patent for its product.[7]

[§ 125] c. Evidence. Abandonment is never presumed.[8] The burden of proving abandonment of an invention is upon the party asserting it.[9] This burden must be sustained by clear and convincing evidence.[10] All reasonable doubt must be resolved against abandonment.[11] Evidence which rests upon doubtful inferences is not sufficient.[12] Proof of facts from which abandonment may be inferred may be rebutted by showing acts assertive of the inventor's right to a monopoly,[13] such as the filing of drawings in the patent,[14] or the carrying on of experiments looking toward improvement and perfection of his discovery.[15] Where the undisputed acts of an inventor furnish evidence of abandonment, his testimony that he did not intend to abandon his invention is not entitled to much weight.[16]

VI. PERSONS ENTITLED TO PATENTS[17]

[By Chas. W. Riley]

[§ 126] A. In General. Congress has been empowered by the constitution to secure to "inventors" the exclusive right to their inventions, and, in pursuance of that authority, it has granted the right to obtain a patent, subject to certain limitations and conditions, to "any person who has invented or discovered" any art, machine, manufacture, composition of matter, or any improvement thereof.[18] The right to obtain a patent for an invention arises in favor of an original inventor only.[19] A patent granted upon the application of one who is not the inventor is void.[20] This is true, even though the application is made at the direction and for the benefit of the true inventor,[21] and even though applicant bought and paid for the surrender or concession by the real inventor of his rights in the invention.[22] Abandonment of the right to a patent by the original inventor does not entitle another to obtain a patent therefor.[23] To entitle one to a patent, however, he must be not only an original, but the first, inventor of the invention claimed.[24] As between two original inventors of the same thing, the first inventor only is entitled to a patent.[25] This is so, even though the first inventor falsely concedes priority.[26]

Importation. No valid patent can be obtained by one who merely imports and introduces a method or device known or used abroad, even though it was not before known or used in this country.[27]

[§ 127] B. Originality of Invention. In order that one may be an original inventor of a method or device it is essential that he himself should have conceived the idea embodied in it.[28] The idea embodied in the method or device claimed must be the product of his mind and genius and not of another.[29] The conception of an invention consists in the complete performance of the mental part of the inventive act.[30] It is the formation in the mind of the inventor of a definite and permanent idea of the complete and operative invention as it is thereafter to be applied in practice.[31] But while it is essential in order that one may be entitled to a patent that he himself should have conceived the idea embodied in the method or device claimed,[32] a mental operation alone, however definite and valuable may be the result, is not a complete inventive act.[33] Except as modified by the doctrine of diligence,[34] an invention, in the sense of the statute, is a completed invention,[35] that is, an invention which is perfected and adapted to use,[36] or, as otherwise expressed, reduced to practice.[37] One who has conceived the idea of an invention has not made an invention until he has perfected the idea and adapted it to use.[38] A conception of the mind is not an invention, or a completed invention, until given expression through and by some physical means which demonstrate its practical efficiency and utility.[39] In other words, one has not made an invention in the legal sense until he has reduced his idea to practice.[40] Mere suggestion of means without disclosure of a method of accomplishment is not invention.[41] One is not an orig-

41. Dayton Engineering Laboratories Co. v. Kent, 260 Fed. 187 [aff 264 Fed. 103].

"An imperfect and incomplete invention, resting in mere theory, or in intellectual notion, or in uncertain experiments, and not actually reduced to practice, and embodied in some distinct machinery, apparatus, manufac-

inal inventor who merely reduces to practice an idea conceived by another.[42] But the mere fact that he availed himself of all knowledge known to the skilled in the art does not deprive him of the right to be considered an original inventor.[43] In order to have that effect the knowledge so obtained must have been so complete as to embrace the whole of the idea claimed, leaving nothing to be created by the inventive faculties.[44] That another suggested the desirability of the result, but not the means by which it is attained, is not sufficient.[45]

Evidence. The burden of proof on the issue whether one to whom a patent has issued is an original inventor of the method or device claimed is on the party asserting the contrary.[46] In order to sustain this burden, lack of originality must be clearly established by satisfactory evidence.[47] A fair preponderance of the credible evidence is essential.[48] There are no artificial rules regulating the determination of the question of original inventorship,[49] and the testimony of a single witness may be sufficient to establish it.[50] It has been asserted that every inference of originality may properly be drawn against a patentee who fails to answer credible testimony that that which he claimed to have invented had been previously disclosed to him by another.[51]

[§ 128] C. Priority of Invention—1. In General. In determining which of two or more inventors of the same thing is entitled to be considered the first inventor the dates of their patents is first to be considered;[52] second, the dates of their applications,[53] provided the application sufficiently describes the invention;[54] third, the dates of actual reduction to practice;[55] fourth, the dates of conception;[56] with this qualification, that, if any inventor seeks to carry the date of his invention back to the date of his conception, he must show reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting his invention, either by actual reduction to practice or by filing his application.[57] Speaking generally, he is the first inventor, and entitled to a patent for his invention, who has first perfected and adapted the same to use.[58] The party

ture, or composition of matter, is not, and indeed cannot be, patentable under our Patent Acts; since it is utterly impossible, under such circumstances, to comply with the fundamental requisites of those acts." Reed v. Cutter, 20 F. Cas. No. 11,645, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 81, 1 Story 590, 599.

"It is also a settled principle in patent law, that whoever first perfects a machine is entitled to the first to reduce to practice is prima facie the first inventor.[59] However, the statutory provision, permitting a defendant in an action upon a patent to set up that plaintiff had "surreptitiously or unjustly obtained his patent for that which was in fact invented by another, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same,"[60] qualifies this general principle.[61] By virtue of this provision, the first conceiver, if he was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting his invention, is regarded as the first inventor notwithstanding the invention was first reduced to practice by another.[62] In other words, he who first conceives and in a mental sense first invents a machine, art, or composition of matter may date his particular invention back to the time of its conception, if he connects the conception with its reduction to practice by reasonable diligence on his part so that they are substantially one continuous act.[63] This rule applies to all inventors, whether patentees or otherwise.[64] But one who was first to conceive but last to perfect and adapt the invention to practical use is not entitled to be considered the first inventor if he fails to connect the conception with its reduction to practice by reasonable diligence so that they are substantially one continuous act.[65] It has been held that this is true, even though he fully disclosed his conception by description,[66] drawings,[67] or even by a model.[68] When the inventor who is first to conceive the invention is also the first to reduce it to practice, he is entitled to be considered the first inventor, even though a subsequent conceiver may anticipate him in applying for[69] or obtaining[70] a patent. In such cases the question of diligence is immaterial.[71] Where both patent therefor, and is the real inventor, although others may have previously had the idea and made some experiments towards putting it in practice; subject, however, to this qualification, that if the party who first conceives the invention was, at the time of a second invention by another party, using reasonable diligence in perfecting the same, he is entitled to be recognized as the first inventor, although the second to conceive may have been the first to reduce to practice, either actual or constructive." parties to an interference reduced to practice at the same time, the one first to conceive the invention must be regarded as the first inventor, irrespective of the question of diligence.[72]

[§ 129] 2. Reduction to Practice—a. In General. An invention is reduced to practice when the inventor's conception is embodied in such form as to render it capable of practical and successful use.[73] Thus a process is reduced to practice when it is successfully performed.[74] A machine is reduced to practice when it is assembled, adjusted, and used.[75] A manufacture is reduced to practice when it is completely manufactured.[76] A composition of matter is reduced to practice when it is completely composed.[77] What constitutes a reduction to practice is a matter, the determination of which must largely depend upon the nature and purpose of the method or device in the particular case.[78] The same act, or set of acts, may or may not constitute a reduction to practice, modified, as they may be, by the special circumstances of the particular case.[79] Actual construction, embodiment, or use of the invention is not necessary if it has been so far disclosed as to enable one skilled in the art to which it belongs to make and use it.[80] The requirement of reduction to practice is satisfied if the inventor has shown operative means to persons skilled in the art.[81] Ordinarily, however, the invention must have been tested and found satisfactory,[82] although some inventions are so simple that no test is necessary to demonstrate their success.[83] Where an invention is designed to perform a definite purpose, a construction embodying it must be capable, when operated, of accomplishing that purpose.[84] Mechanical perfection, however, is not necessary.[85] If the operative means accomplish the desired end, reduction to practice is established,[86] although it appears on inspection that the elements of the device should have been made stronger,[87] or given a better shape,[88] arrangement,[89] or adjustment.[90] The fact that improvement obvious to the skilled in the art may be made to perfect the operation of the means or to increase its practical efficiency does not justify the conclusion that the invention was without practical utility[91] or that its reduction to practice was a failure.[92] A construction which fails to embody an essential element of the invention is not a reduction to practice.[93] Nor is reduction to practice accomplished by a test which fails to demonstrate the capability of the method or device for performing its intended function.[94] Where necessary to demonstrate the utility of the method or device, reduction to practice must be by test under actual working conditions.[95] This rule does not apply, however, where it is impossible for the inventor to make his tests under service conditions,[96] or where, because of government control or the pledges to the government, the inventor is denied

"Reduction to practice is not merely a matter of construction, building and trial, but may consist in the disclosure of the idea by any kind of description, pictorial, verbal, or written, which will enable one skilled in the art to make and use that which is disclosed. We think a drawing may possibly be a sufficient reduction to practice, and an experimental machine insufficient, for the question is one of degree, and the ultimate test is always whether the inventor has shown operative means to that theoretically omnipresent person, the man skilled in the art." information as to the experiments actually made.[97] Commercial use of a method or device is not essential to reduction to practice.[98] It has been asserted that reduction to practice may consist in the disclosure of the idea by any kind of description which will enable one skilled in the art to make and use that which is disclosed,[99] and that a drawing may possibly be a sufficient reduction to practice.[1] It has been held, however, that an invention is not reduced to practice by the mere making of sketches or drawings, no matter how fully they may disclose the invention.[2] An invention is not reduced to practice by the construction of a model,[3] unless the practicability of the invention is thereby fully demonstrated.[4] The reduction to practice must be by applicant himself, or by his authorized agent, and not by some other third party.[5] It is not enough to entitle an applicant to a patent that some one else has shown the practicability of the invention by reducing it to practice. The work of such third party will not be taken as sufficient to relieve applicant of the consequences of his own want of diligence.[6]

Construction and use abroad cannot be taken advantage of in this country as actual reduction to practice.[7]

[§ 130] b. Filing Application for Patent. The filing of an allowable application for a patent is a constructive reduction to practice of the invention at the date when it was filed.[8] In other words, an application for a patent, if it sufficiently describes the invention, is conclusive evidence that the invention was made at least as early as that date.[9] There is no reduction to practice by filing an application, however, if the method or device described therein is inoperative.[10]

Unclaimed disclosures. It is now settled that what was disclosed in an application duly filed is reduction to practice, and evidences a completed invention at that date, even though it was not then claimed.[11]

Foreign applications. By virtue of the express statutory provision according to United States applications the same force and effect as they would have if filed on the date upon which a prior foreign application was filed,[12] the filing of an application in a foreign country having the requisite treaty relations, disclosing the invention in question, constitutes a constructive reduction to practice.[13] This is true, even though the application, although containing a claim broad enough to include the particular method or device in question, did not claim it specifically.[14] But the benefit of this provision does not extend to those who filed foreign applications prior to the date upon which the requisite treaty relations were entered into.[15]

[§ 131] 3. Diligence. While an inventor who seeks to carry the date of his invention back to the date of his conception must show reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting his invention,[16] reasonable diligence is all that is required.[17] Whether the inventor has used reasonable diligence is a question to be determined not by any fixed standard, but by taking into consideration all the circumstances of the particular case.[18] Thus it is proper to consider the nature of the invention,[19] the situation of the inventor,[20] including his health[21] and means,[22] and the length of time between conception and reduction to practice.[23] A reasonable time is allowed for experiments;[24] but only a reasonable time.[25] It is not necessary that an inventor should give all his time to the development of his invention[26] or abandon his ordinary means of livelihood.[27] But while it is proper to consider the situation of the inventor,[28] poverty and illness will not excuse indefinite delays.[29] And delay due to a mistake in supposing the invention to be covered by a prior patent is not excusable.[30] Diligence in applying for a patent is effective.[31] Diligence in working on other inventions, however, is not.[32] Lack of diligence in prosecuting an application after it has been filed is of no consequence.[33] Ordinarily the mere making of drawings is not diligence.[34] Diligence is required in the reduction of the invention to practice rather than in exploiting it commercially.[35] The question of due diligence is not a matter of comparative diligence as between the two parties,[36] or, as it is sometimes called, a "race of diligence."[37] If the second to conceive is the first to reduce to practice, his claim is founded upon that fact, and derives no support from previous efforts.[38] Knowledge of the entry of the rival in the field is not necessary in order to impose the duty of diligence.[39] Effective diligence must commence before a rival inventor entered the field, and continue thereafter.[40]

[§ 132] 4. Evidence. The burden of proof on the issue whether one to whom a patent has been issued is the first inventor of the invention claimed is on the party asserting the contrary,[41] unless, of course, priority has been awarded to a patent issued later, in which case the burden is upon the first patentee.[42] Ordinarily this burden must be sustained by evidence that is clear, positive, and unequivocal,[43] leaving nothing to speculation and conjecture.[44] Where a claim of priority is first made many years after the issuance of the patent and is supported by oral evidence only, the proof must satisfy beyond a reasonable doubt.[45] It has been held, however, that as between rival inventors whose applications were pending at the same time, the junior applicant is required to establish priority only by a fair preponderance of the evidence and not by proof conclusive in character, or beyond a reasonable doubt.[46] When it is shown that another made the invention prior to the date of the patentee's application, the burden of producing evidence to show an earlier date is upon the party seeking to maintain the patent,[47] and such earlier date must be established by satisfactory evidence[48]—evidence characterized by some courts as proof beyond a reasonable doubt,[49] and by others as evidence at least equal in quality to that establishing invention earlier than the application.[50] While it is true that uncorroborated testimony of an inventor is to be accepted with caution,[51] yet there is no rule of law that requires the rejection of the uncorroborated testimony of an inventor as to the date of his conception.[52] The court must be satisfied as to the fact of demonstration and that the conception was complete.[53] A mere assertion of the inventor at a given time, unaccompanied by contemporaneous acts or words indicating its existence, is not sufficient evidence;[54] but if a court is satisfied of the good faith, and the truth of the apprehension of the invention is definite enough to have enabled him to reduce it to practice without a further exercise of inventive skill, that is sufficient.[55] In other words an earlier conception, when alleged, is a matter of fact, and must be established by sufficient proof.[56] Where there has been disclosure to others, or embodiment of the invention in some clearly perceptible form, such as a drawing, with sufficient proof of identity in point of law, that is sufficient.[57] While the mere unsupported evidence of the alleged inventor on an issue of priority, as to the fact of conception and time, cannot be received as sufficient proof of prior conception,[58] any full and accurate description of the invention, either in words[59] or drawings[60] or by model,[61] will suffice, although the attempt to represent it may have failed.[62] All that the law requires is that the drawings exhibited and relied on as evidence of the conception of the invention must show a complete conception, free from ambiguity or doubt, and such as would enable the inventor or others skilled in the art to reduce the conception to practice without any further exercise of inventive skill.[63] It has been held that a rejected application is not sufficient to establish priority of invention.[64] However, it is now settled that what was disclosed in an application duly filed is reduction to practice, and evidences a completed invention at that date, even though it was not then claimed.[65]

[§ 133] D. Joint Inventors—1. In General. Joint inventors may properly obtain a patent for a joint invention.[66] No one of them, however, can obtain a valid patent therefor as the sole inventor.[67] This is so, even though he is the assignee of all interest of the others in the invention.[68] On the other hand, a patent issued to two or more persons as joint inventors is invalid where one of them is the sole inventor.[69]

[§ 134] 2. What Constitutes Joint Invention. The question whether an invention is a joint invention or not is a question of fact to be determined in view of all the circumstances,[70] including the relations of the parties[71] and their method of work.[72] A joint invention is the result of the mutual contributions and united efforts of the parties,[73] and no one can be a joint inventor of a method or device unless he had some share in its conception;[74] but it may be considered as settled that, in order to constitute persons joint inventors, it is not necessary that exactly the same idea should have occurred to each at the same time, and that they should work out together the embodiment of that idea in a perfected machine.[75] One may be a joint inventor, even though the conception of the entire device may be due to another if he makes suggestions of practical value which assisted in working out the main idea and making it operative,[76] or contributes an independent part of the entire invention, which is united with the parts produced by the other and creates the whole.[77] One is not a joint inventor if his conception or contribution covers a distinct and independent part of the method or device, and is not an element which contributes to the operativeness

"To constitute two persons joint inventors it is not necessary that exactly the same idea should have occurred to each at the same time, and that they should work out together the embodiment of this idea in a perfected machine. Such a coincidence of ideas would scarcely ever occur to two persons at the same time. If an idea is suggested to one, and he even goes so far as to construct a machine embodying this idea, but it is not a completed and working machine, and another person takes hold of it, and by their joint labors, one suggesting one thing and the other another, a perfect machine is made, a joint patent may properly issue to them." [§ 135] 3. Evidence. A presumption that an invention is a joint invention arises from the filing of a joint application.[81] This presumption is strengthened by the issuance of a joint patent.[82] To overcome the presumption clear and convincing proof is required.[83] Similarly, clear and convincing evidence is required to establish that a patent issued to one as sole inventor covered a joint invention.[84] A contention that one of the persons who made application for a patent as joint inventors was the sole inventor of the invention claimed is regarded as technical and is not favored either in infringement suits[85] or in interference proceedings.[86] In infringement actions the issuance of a patent to two persons as joint inventors constitutes prima facie proof that the invention was joint,[87] and in an interference proceeding a joint application is prima facie evidence of that fact.[88] In an action for the infringement of a patent, the burden of showing as a defense that the patentee was a joint inventor with some other person, of the thing invented, is on defendant.[89] Unless there is a preponderance of evidence to the contrary, joint invention may be established in an interference proceeding by the uncorroborated testimony of one of the parties.[90]

[§ 136] E. Employer and Employee.[91] One who has conceived the general principle or plan of an invention is not deprived of the right to be regarded as the inventor of the method or device embodying his conception by the fact that other persons employed by him for the purpose reduced or assisted in reducing his conception to practice;[92] and, in general, he may properly claim as his own invention any modification, change, improvement, or discovery, not in itself a complete and independent invention, suggested or made by the employee with respect to the means of realizing the conception communicated to him by the employer.[93] The rule just stated is applicable only if the relation between the parties is substantially that of employer and employee.[94] It is not applicable merely because the parties are engaged in the work of a common employer.[95] It is otherwise, however, if the coemployees bear to each other the relation of principal and assistant.[96] Employees, as much as employers, are entitled to their

[a] Rule applied.—A claim that patentees were not the original discoverers of the process patented because an employee of theirs made the analyses and observations which resulted immediately in the discovery cannot be allowed where the proof establishes that the patentees planned the experiments in progress when the discovery was made, directed the investigations day by day, conducting them in large part personally, and that they interpreted the results. own independent inventions;[97] and where the suggestions of the employee go to make up a complete and perfect method or device, embracing the substance of all that is embodied in a patent issued subsequently to the party to whom suggestions were made, the patent is invalid.[98] The rule that one who employs another to perfect the details of an invention of which he has conceived the general principle or plan is entitled to the benefit of the other's work does not apply where the general principle was not conceived by the employer,[99] or, if it was, was not communicated to the employee.[1] Nor can an employer be regarded as the actual inventor where he merely suggested the desirability of a certain result without communicating any suggestions as to the means by which it could be attained.[2] This is true, even though the employee made the invention or discovery while making experiments at the request and expense of the employer.[3] The communication made by the employer must be sufficiently full and clear with respect to the essential elements of the invention to enable the employee to give it practical form and effect without the exercise of invention on his part.[4] In other words, the work of the employee in giving form and effect to the invention communicated must be nothing more than the exercise of mechanical skill as applied to the subject matter.[5] The original conception as disclosed by the employer need not be identical in all respects with the method or device finally adopted.[6] If the generic invention was communicated to the employee, the employer is not deprived of the right to obtain a patent for the specific method or device produced by the employee by the fact that a slightly different embodiment was disclosed to the employee.[7]

Presumptions and burden of proof. Where the relation of employer and employee is established, a presumption arises that the employer is the inventor of the thing produced by their joint effort,[8] and he who asserts that the invention is the independent invention of the employee has the burden of establishing that fact by clear and satisfactory proof.[9] The presumption in favor of the employer is, of course, strengthened by a decision of the patent office awarding him priority over the employee in interference proceedings.[10] Before any such presumption arises, it must appear that the employee was engaged in perfecting the device under the general directions of the employer,[11] or, at least, that the broad idea was disclosed to the employee by the employer.[12]

[§ 137] F. Government Employees. Government employees other than employees of the patent office have the same right to obtain a patent for an invention as persons not engaged in the government service.[13]

Officers and employees of patent office. Congress has expressly provided that all officers and employees of the patent office shall be incapable, during the period for which they hold their appointments, to acquire or take directly or indirectly, except by inheritance or bequest, any right or interest in any patent issued by the office.[14] A person taking employment in the patent office does not thereby forfeit, or dedicate to the public, any invention previously made by him.[15] The statute merely prevents him from acquiring an interest in a patent while he remains an employee of the office.[16] When his employment ceases, he may obtain a patent for an invention made either before his employment commenced,[17] or during his term of office.[18] If made during his term of office, the patent dates from the time the invention was made.[19]

[§ 138] G. Assignees.[20] By authority of express statutory provision,[21] patents may be granted and issued to the assignee of the inventor.[22] The statute provides that the assignment must first be entered of record in the patent office.[23] But recording at any time before the patent is issued is sufficient.[24] If they are first entered of record in the patent office, it is immaterial that the assignee holds through mesne assignments from the inventor.[25] Whether the patent shall issue to the inventor or to the assignee is left to the discretion of the patent office.[26] A patent may issue jointly to the inventor and his assignee where the assignee holds an undivided part interest.[27] A valid patent may issue to an assignee of two applicants who applied for the patent as joint inventors, even though one of the applicants was the sole inventor.[28]

Patent office rules. The rules of the patent office provide that, in order that a patent may issue to an assignee, the assignment must be entered not later than the date of the payment of the final fee,[29] and require the assignment, if given subsequently to the execution of the application, to give the date of execution of the application, or the date of filing, or the serial number, so that there can be no mistake as to the particular invention intended.[30] The rules also provide that, in case of an assignment of the whole interest in the invention, or of the whole interest in the patent to be granted, the patent will issue to the assignee; and if the assignee holds an undivided part interest, the patent will issue jointly to the inventor and the assignee.[31]

[§ 139] H. Personal Representatives of Deceased Inventor—1. In General. Congress has expressly provided that, when any person, having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted, dies before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve upon the executor or administrator, in trust for the heirs at law of decedent. in case he should have died intestate, or, if he shall have left a will disposing of the same, then in trust for his devisees in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him in his lifetime.[32] This provision is applicable not only when the inventor dies before filing his application,[33] but also when death transpires after the application has been filed.[34] The statute under consideration does not prescribe the form of the letters patent to be issued,[35] and while the rules of the patent office now provide that the letters patent may issue to the executor or administrator upon proper intervention,[36] the validity of the patent is not affected by the fact that the letters patent were issued in the name of the deceased inventor.[37] Nor is it essential to the validity of the letters patent that they contain words creating a trust in favor of the heirs or devisees,[38] or that such beneficiaries be named upon the face of the patent.[39]

[§ 140] 2. Foreign Executors or Administrators. By express statutory provision the executor or administrator duly authorized by the law of any foreign country to administer upon the estate of a deceased inventor shall, in case such inventor was not domiciled in the United States at the time of his death, have the right to apply for and obtain the patent.[40] The authority of such foreign executor or administrator is required to be proved by certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States.[41]

[§ 141] I. Guardians of Insane Persons. Congress has expressly provided that, when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve upon his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him while sane.[42]

[§ 142] J. Married Women. The right of a married woman to obtain a patent is the same as that of a feme sole.[43]

[§ 143] K. Infants. The right of an inventor to obtain a patent is not affected by the fact that he is an infant.[44] This is so, even though he is under guardianship.[45]

[§ 144] L. Nonresidents. The present statute contains no limitation on the right of an inventor to obtain a patent by reason of his being a nonresident of the United States.[46]

[§ 145] M. Aliens. An early statute limited the right to obtain a patent to citizens of the United States.[47] By a subsequent act, all the rights and privileges given to citizens of the United States were extended to aliens, who, at the time of petitioning, had resided for two years within the United States.[48] The present statute granting the right to obtain a patent to "any person who has invented or discovered" any patentable invention contains no limitation with respect to the citizenship of the inventor.[49]

In England, the statute specifically provides that any person, whether a British subject or not, may make an application for a patent.[50]

VII. APPLICATION AND PROCEEDINGS THEREON*[51]

[§ 146] A. In General. The procedure by which a patent for an invention may be obtained is prescribed by statute[52] and the rules of the patent office.[53] The right to obtain a patent being entirely statutory,[54] it is essential that all the requirements relating to the application and to the proceedings thereon be complied with.[55] of express statutory provision,[56] the right to obtain a United States patent for an invention depends on an application made and pending for that purpose.[57]

[§ 148] C. Requisites of Application—1. In General. Applications for letters patent of the United States must be made to the commissioner of patents.[58] They must be in writing,[59] and signed by the inventor,[60] or, in the event of his death or insanity, by his executor or administrator or his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative.[61] The application must be in the English language,[62] and must include a petition, specification, and oath, and drawings when required.[63] Every application must conform to these requirements.[64] The patent office has no power to dispense with any of them.[65] Until all the parts of the application and the first fee of twenty dollars and one dollar for each claim in excess of twenty has been received, the application will not be placed upon the files for examination.[66]

[§ 149] 2. The Petition. An applicant for a patent must file a petition requesting the grant of a patent.[67] The petition must be addressed to the commissioner of patents,[68] it must be in the English language,[69] and must state the name, residence, and post-office address of the petitioner,[70] designate by title the invention sought to be patented,[71] contain a reference to the specifications for a full disclosure of such invention,[72] and must be signed by the inventor,[73] or, in case of his death or insanity, by his personal representative.[74] It need not describe the invention except by reference to the specification.[75]

[§ 150] 3. The Specification—a. In General. An applicant for a patent is required by statute to file a written description of his invention or discovery, and of the manner and process of making, constructing, compounding, and using it, and particularly to point out and distinctly claim the part, improvement, or combination which he claims as his invention or discovery.[76] The written description and the claim, taken together, constitute what is known in the language of the patent law as the "specification."[77] The term "specification" is sometimes used in a limited sense, excluding the claim, and including only the description.[78] The filing of the required specification forms the consideration for the issuance of the patent,[79] being regarded as a condition precedent to the right of the commissioner to grant the application;[80] and no valid patent can be obtained if this requirement is not complied with.[81] The specification must be in the English language.[82]

The object of the specification is to make the invention accessible to the public,[83] and to define the limits of the monopoly given by the public to the patentee.[84] Another purpose of this requirement is to enable the patent office and the courts to determine whether the subject matter claimed as invention is new or old.[85]

[§ 151] b. Description of Invention—(1) In General. Applicant must describe the invention itself,[86]

some practical method of carrying it into effect,[87] and some practical use to which it may be applied.[88] The applicant is required not only to describe some practical method of carrying his invention into effect,[89] but to describe what he conceives to be the best mode.[90] However, he need not describe all possible ways of carrying the invention into effect.[91] Nor is he required to specify all possible methods of using the invention.[92] While the description must be complete in itself,[93] it may be read in connection with the models or drawings which accompany it.[94]

[§ 152] (2) Sufficiency of Description—(a) In General. The statute expressly provides that the description which applicant must file shall be in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art and science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound, and use the invention or discovery.[95] A description possessing such a degree of fullness, clarity, and exactitude is essential to the validity of a patent.[96] No valid patent can be obtained where the description is so vague or in-

"It is objected that there is no reference in the specification to the fact that the object of the invention was to produce a fabric capable of being fleeced. But it is well settled that the patentee is not obliged to state all the objects of his invention, and that he is protected in all the beneficial uses thereof within its scope; and here no statement as to fleecing was necessary." Scott v. Fisher Knitting Mach. Co., 145 Fed. 915, 918, 76 CCA 447.

[a] Illustration.—It is not necessarily improper for a patentee, believing himself to be the inventor of a new process, so to frame his claims and specification as to anticipate and cut off attacks in the patent office that may be based upon a prior art which he considers irrelevant, and for this purpose to omit mention of a substance capable of use in the practice of his process which may have been described in prior patents. definite that persons skilled in the art are unable to make and use the invention,[97] or where such inability results from incompleteness of description.[98] It has been asserted that nothing should be left to experiment.[99] The specification, however, is addressed to persons skilled in the art,[1] and a description is sufficient if it will enable any person skilled in the art to make and use the invention.[2] This is true, even though the description is to some extent inaccurate,[3] indefinite,[4] or incomplete.[5] A description is not rendered insufficient by the fact that it is unintelligible to the unskilled,[6] or by the mere fact that persons skilled in the art might find it necessary to make several tests or trials in order to achieve the desired result,[7] or to ascertain the best working conditions.[8] The certainty of description which the statute requires is not greater than is reasonable, having regard for the subject matter.[9] That which is common and well-known need not be described.[10] Nor is it necessary to describe that which contributes only to the degree of benefit to be derived from the invention.[11] Whether a description is sufficient to enable a person of ordinary skill to make and use it is a question of fact;[12] in determining the question, all the surrounding circumstances are to be considered,[13] including the art to which the invention belongs,[14] its relation to other arts,[15] and the nature of the invention itself.[16] In general, the phrase "skilled in the art" refers to those of ordinary skill rather than the very expert.[17] But the phrase is always [a] Reason for rule.—"When an astronomer reports that a comet is to be seen with the telescope in the constellation of Auriga, in so many degrees of declination, and so many hours and minutes of right ascension, it is all Greek to the unskilled in science; but other astronomers will instantly direct their telescopes to the very point in the heavens where the stranger has made his entrance into our system. They understand the language of their brother scientist. If a mechanical engineer invents an improvement on any of the appendages of a steam-engine, such as the valve-gear, the condenser, the steam-chest, the walking-beam, the parallel motion, or what not, he is not obliged, in order to make himself understood, to describe the engine, nor the particular appendage to which the improvement refers, nor its mode of connection with the principal machine. These are already familiar to others skilled in that kind of machinery. He may begin at the point where his invention begins, and describe what he had made that is new, and what it replaces of the old." Webster Loom Co. v. Higgins, 105 U. S. 580, 585, 27 L. ed. 1117.

Statement of scientific theory underlying invention. If the inventor does not know the philosophical principles upon which his invention works or what takes place during its operation, the failure to describe them does not render the patent void so long as the description is sufficient to enable those skilled in the art to practice the invention and get the results desired.[19]

[§ 153] (b) Methods or Processes. The description of an art or process must be such as to enable persons skilled in the art to use it without the necessity of making experiments or changes involving invention.[20] No valid patent can be obtained where persons skilled in the art are unable to do so by reason of the failure of applicant to describe the acts which constitute the process,[21] or the means or instrumentalities employed in their performance,[22] or where such inability results from the fact that the description is vague or indefinite[23] or incomplete.[24] A description of the result of an art or process is not a description of the art or process itself.[25] As in other cases, however,[26] the description of an art or process is read in the light of the prior art,[27] and that which is common or well-known to persons skilled in the art need not be described.[28] A description is sufficient if it enables persons skilled in the art to use it, even though it is to some extent vague or indefinite,[29] inaccurate,[30] or incomplete,[31] and even though it is not intelligible to persons unskilled in the art to which the invention appertains.[32] Thus a specification is sufficient if it discloses enough to indicate to those skilled in the art the instrumentalities employed in its exercise, even though no specific instrumentalities are described,[33] and even though some experiment may be required to produce the

[a] Rule applied.—(1) Claims in a patent for a method of incubation are not void for indefiniteness, because they do not prescribe the exact proportions or exact temperatures to be employed, if those proportions and temperatures can be ascertained by one skilled in the art, who attempts to practice the method. (2) That the claim of a patent for a method of exhausting incandescent electric lamps contains no limitation as to the extent to which the bulb must be exhausted before sealing, and the specification only states it approximately, would not render the disclosure of the patent insufficient to enable one skilled in the art to practice the process, although it might be necessary to make several tests to determine with exactness what the patentee meant by the expression "exhausted to the extent of about two millimeters of mercury." best results.[34] So, likewise, variations in treatment required by the nature of the subject matter to which the process is applied need not be described where the description given is sufficiently definite to guide those skilled in the art to its successful application.[35] All possible instrumentalities which may be employed in practicing the invention need not be described.[36] It is immaterial that the particular mode or apparatus described is not the best or the one generally in use.[37]

The naming of nonessential conditions by a patentee, so long as the essential conditions of a process to accomplish the desired results are set forth in the patent, is immaterial, it not appearing that the patentee describes as essential a condition which would defeat the successful performance of the process, or omits an essential condition not implied by a familiar knowledge of the art.[38]

Scientific principle. If the description of an art or process is sufficient to enable persons skilled in the art to use it with certainty, it is not rendered insufficient by the fact that it omitted to describe the scientific principle underlying the process,[39] or by the fact that it contained an erroneous statement of the principle.[40]

[§ 154] (c) Machines. An applicant for a machine patent must explain the principle thereof,[41] and the best mode in which he has contemplated applying that principle.[42] Nonessential elements need not be described,[43] and, as in other cases,[44] absolute accuracy of description is not required.[45] A description of a machine is sufficient if persons skilled in the art are enabled thereby to make and use it without exercising further invention.[46] This is true, even though the description is to some extent vague or indefinite[47] or incomplete,[48] and even though the scientific principle upon which the machine operates is omitted[49] or misstated.[50] However, no valid patent can be obtained if persons skilled in the art to which the new machine relates are unable to make and use it by reason of the failure of the description to disclose every element essential to its practical working and use.[51] Details supplied by knowledge of those skilled in the art need not be described,[52] but unless so supplied every part must be described,[53] together with its location,[54] form,[55] size,[56] composition,[57] relation to other parts,[58] or any other characteristic essential to the practical operation of the machine.[59] That experiment may be necessary in order that persons skilled in the art may success-

"But it is said that the patent in suit discloses no means of practically operating the method shown, and therefore, as said by the learned judge in the Third Circuit, 'it is but the expression of a happy thought,' but the requirement of the patent law, in order to make a method or process patentable, is that the patent shall indicate to those skilled in the art the adaptation of means to put it into practice. We think this record amply discloses, while no complete mechanism is pointed out in the specifications, enough to indicate to those skilled in such matters a mechanism whereby the method of the patent can be put into operation." fully use the machine is not fatal where the exercise of further invention is not required.[60] Where an invention does not embrace an entire machine, the part claimed should be specified and pointed out so that persons may use the machine without the invention if they see fit,[61] and it is not necessary to describe the entire machine.[62]

[§ 155] (d) Manufactures. A manufacture may be described by enumerating its essential characteristics,[63] or by a description of the mode of manufacture.[64] However, the description of a manufacture must identify it so that it can be recognized aside from the description of the process of making it.[65] The mode of manufacture need not be described when the manufacture is sufficiently described by enumerating its essential characteristics.[66] If the article is described by enumerating its essential characteristics, the description must be sufficiently clear, accurate, and complete to disclose them to any person skilled in the art.[67] And, if described by a description of the mode of manufacture, the method of production must be disclosed in terms sufficiently clear, accurate, and complete to enable such persons to produce the article.[68] A description which meets this test, however, is sufficient.[69] This is true, even though the description is to some extent indefinite,[70] inaccurate,[71] or incomplete.[72]

[§ 156] (e) Compositions of Matter. An applicant for a patent for a composition of matter must describe the composition,[73] its ingredients,[74] and the method of their intermixture,[75] including the proportions of the several ingredients.[76] The description must be in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable anyone skilled in the art to which it appertains to compound and use it,[77] or, as more often expressed, to compound and use it without making any experiments of his own.[78] As in the case of a manufacture,[79] the composition itself may be described either by enumerating its essential characteristics,[80] or by describing the method by which it may be produced.[81] A description is insufficient which describes a composition of matter, not in terms of its own physical characteristics or chemical properties, but wholly in terms of its use or function.[82] A description of a composition of matter is sufficient if intelligible to persons skilled in the art to which the invention relates.[83] The claim for a composition is not void because the exact proportions are not stated, where the proportions may be varied.[84] A description which gives a certain proportion as the general rule is not ambiguous because it also states exceptions to the general rule, applicable where the ingredients used differ in quality from those ordinarily used,[85] unless the qualities of the ingredients vary so widely that the specification of the proportions stated are of no value.[86]

[§ 157] (f) Improvements. The general rule governing the sufficiency of description of the thing for which a patent is asked[87] applies in the case of improvements.[88] The description must show clearly, accurately, and fully in what the improvement consists.[89] It should be confined to the specific improvement and such parts of the old mechanism as necessarily coöperate with it.[90] It should distinguish between the old and the new,[91] and for this purpose some reference to the method or device improved must be made.[92] It is usually unnecessary to describe the old machine in detail,[93] a general reference thereto being sufficient,[94] unless a description of the whole machine as it operates with the improvement is essential to make the description understood by a person skilled in the art to which it belongs.[95] A description of the improvement claimed is sufficient if it will enable those skilled in the art to make and use it.[96] If the description is sufficiently clear, accurate, and complete to enable any person skilled in the art to make and use the improvement, it is immaterial that the terms used are unintelligible to unskilled persons[97] or that the improvement is not in all respects completely described.[98]

[§ 158] (g) Combinations. The requirement of full, clear, concise, and exact description applies with as much force to applications for inventions consisting merely of a new combination of old elements as to any other inventions.[99] All the essential elements of the combination must be described,[1] together with the method of combining them.[2] A claim for a combination which embraces an element only in case it is made capable of being employed in the combination and without disclosing means of adapting it discloses nothing definite.[3] An invention consisting merely of a new combination of old elements or devices is sufficiently described if the devices of which it is composed are specifically named, their mode of operation given, and the new and useful result to be accomplished is pointed out, in terms sufficiently full, clear, concise, and exact as to enable those skilled in the art to which the invention relates to make and use the combination.[4] Applicant need not point out what elements are or are not new in the combination claimed.[5] Nor is it necessary to describe all parts of the method or device of which the combination is a part, except so far as they enter into the mode of combining and arranging the elements of the combination claimed.[6]

[§ 159] (h) Designs. An application for a design patent must describe the design in terms sufficiently full, clear, concise, and exact as to enable persons skilled in the art to make and use it.[7] A description so vague and indefinite that persons

[a] Rule applied.—The use of the word "to" instead of "for" in the phrase "triturated to a paste" in a description of a solder did not invalidate the patent for want of sufficient description. Kupper v. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co., 212 Fed. 184, 185 [aff 222 Fed. 1023, 137 CCA 430].

[a] Distinction between improvements on patented and unpatented machines.—"As to the supposed distinction between an improvement on a machine patented, and one not so, there is nothing in it. In both cases, the improvement must be described; but with this difference—that, in the former case, it may be sufficient to refer to the patent, and specification, for a description of the original machine; and then to state in what the improvements on such original machine consist;—whereas, in the latter case, it would be necessary to describe the original machine, and also the improvement. The reason for this distinction is too obvious to require explanation." Evans v. Eaton, 8 F. Cas. No. 4,560, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 193, 3 Wash. C. C. 443, 454.

skilled in the art are unable to determine in what the design consists will not support a design patent.[8] The application need not in all cases contain a detailed written description of the design.[9] If there be some writing to indicate upon what character of goods the design is to be applied, a photograph or drawing may be substituted.[10] This is the rule adopted by the patent office.[11] A detailed verbal description is not necessarily improper,[12] and is in fact required if without it the design cannot be understood.[13]

Under the rules of the patent office, the design must be represented by a drawing made to conform to the rules applicable to drawings of mechanical inventions.[14] When the design can be sufficiently represented by drawings, a model will not be required.[15]

[§ 160] (3) Concealment and Deception.[16] A patent is void where, for the purpose of deceiving the public, the description or specification was made to contain less than the whole truth relative to the invention or more than is necessary to produce the desired effect.[17] To invalidate the patent on this ground, however, the omissions must have been made with intent to deceive.[18] Omissions due to mistake or error of judgment are not sufficient.[19] Nor is a patent fatally defective for its omission to describe a feature which the patentee did not claim as his invention and which is not an essential element of what he did claim.[20]

[§ 161] c. Claim or Claims[21]—(1) In General. The statute requires an applicant for a patent not only to describe the invention for which he seeks a patent, but also that he shall particularly point out and distinctly claim the part, improvement, or combination which he claims as his invention or discovery,[22] and the rules of the patent office require that the specification must conclude with a specific and distinct claim or claims of the part, improvement, or combination which applicant regards as his invention or discovery.[23] This part of the specification is technically called the "claim,"[24] and its office is to define the limits of the exclusive privilege sought.[25] No patent can be obtained for an invention not claimed.[26] The object of this requirement is not only to secure to the inventor all to which he is entitled, but to apprise the public of what is still open to it.[27] It was not intended to secure to the inventor his whole invention unless he claimed the whole.[28] If he claims only a part, or some particular form, such part or particular form only is secured to him.[29] On the other hand, the fact that the inventor does not claim all he has invented does not affect his right to be secured in what he has claimed.[30] A valid patent may issue, however much narrower the claim than what applicant might have obtained.[31] An applicant need not claim every advantage which may reside in his invention.[32]

[§ 162] (2) Vague and Indefinite, Ambiguous, or Incomplete Claims. In making a claim, applicant is at liberty to use any form of expression.[33] But whatever the form, the claim must be stated in terms sufficiently definite and clear to inform the public with certainty just what it is that the patentee secures as a monopoly.[34] No valid patent can be obtained if the true meaning of the claim cannot be made out without resorting to conjecture, as where the language of the claim is vague or indefinite,[35] ambiguous,[36] or incomplete.[37] Claims are addressed to those skilled in the particular art or science,[38] and a claim is not objectionable if such persons are able to understand what is claimed, even though it may be in some respects vague or indefinite[39] or incomplete.[40] A claim for a machine or for a combination of mechanical devices is not insufficient because it does not include mechanical devices for uniting and operating the elements of the combination or machine which would readily suggest themselves to persons skilled in the art.[41] Unless the peculiar nature of the subject matter requires it, the claim need not be expressed with technical exactness.[42] A patent should not be held invalid merely because its language may be too vague for application to some possible future case.[43] Whether a claim is vague and uncertain is a question of law to be determined by the rules of construction applied in the light of the state of the art.[44]

Alternative claims. Claims should not seek to include two elements by referring to them in the alternative but should use some broad term of description applicable to both.[45]

[§ 163] (3) Excessive Claims[46]—(a) In General. An applicant should draw his claims to cover his actual invention only.[47] Thus, where the invention is for an improvement, the patentee must lay claim only to his improvement and not to the improved method or device.[48] A claim which is so broad as to include what is old as well as what is new cannot be sustained.[49] This is true whether the old matter was claimed purposely or by mistake.[50] The fact that the patent claims too much is the test, and not the motive or circumstance in which the excessive claim originated.[51] Whether a claim includes that which is old as well as what is new is a question of law to be determined by the rules of construction applied in the light of the state of the art.[52]

Exaggeration of advantages. Where the statements are not made fraudulently, exaggerated or unwarranted statements as to the capabilities of the invention do not affect the validity of the claim.[53]

[§ 164] (b) Functional Claims. A claim for the function of a method or device, as distinguished from the method or device itself, is properly rejected,[54] and is void if allowed.[55] Thus, if the invention is a machine, a claim not only for the mechanism but for the mode of operation generally cannot be sustained.[56] But a claim is not invalid as functional, if it is not beyond the broadest equivalency which the real invention permitted.[57]

[§ 165] (c) Claims for an Effect or Result. A claim which includes the mere effect or result of a method or device, as distinguished from the method or device itself, is properly rejected as too broad,[58] and, if allowed, cannot be sustained.[59]

[§ 166] (4) Duplicitous Claims. Only one single and distinct invention may be included in a single claim.[60] Several distinct inventions, each complete in itself, must be separately claimed.[61] Thus one who has invented a process by which an article of manufacture is produced must make them the subject of separate and distinct claims.[62]

[§ 167] (5) Multiplicity of Claims. There is nothing improper in including a number of claims in a single application.[63] Thus it is not objectionable for an applicant first to make as broad a claim as he can in good faith and follow it with narrower claims differentiated from each other to protect himself against possible anticipations.[64] The claims must contain in themselves material differences[65] and should not consist of mere repetition in varying phraseology of the same thing.[66] If carried to the extent of creating ambiguity, the patent may be rendered invalid.[67]

[§ 168] (6) Joinder of Claims—(a) In General. There is nothing in the language of the statutes relating to patents which necessarily precludes the joinder of claims for two or more inventions in the same application,[68] and it is well established that several distinct inventions may be claimed in one application if they are dependent upon each other and mutually contribute to produce a single result.[69] Refusal by the patent office to consider an application containing claims for a process and the apparatus by which the process is performed, without determining whether the inventions are related and dependent, is not the exercise of discretion but a determination not to hear,[70] and a rule of the patent office, in so far as it requires a division between such claims if they are related and dependent inventions, is invalid.[71] Inventions, however, are distinguished into arts, machines, manufactures, and compositions of matter,[72] and it is also well established that the joinder of two or more independent inventions in a single application is improper.[73] The foregoing rules are embodied in the rules of the patent office,[74] and while it has been asserted that the inclusion of two or more independent inventions in a single patent is fatal to the validity of the patent,[75] it now seems settled that the discretion of the patent office in the application of the rules with respect to joinder of claims will not be reviewed by the courts,[76] except in cases of clear abuse.[77] The practice is firmly established that a single patent may contain the generic and relatively generic claims and a specific claim to one form only of the concrete embodiment.[78] Accordingly, where the application presents specific claims to alternative forms, applicant is required to confine his claims in that application to one form.[79]

Division of application. The rules of the patent office provide that if several inventions claimed in a single application be of such a nature that a single patent may not be issued to cover them, the inventor will be required to limit the description, drawing, and claim of the pending application to whichever invention he may elect.[80] The other inventions may be made the subjects of separate applications, which must conform to the rules applicable to original applications.[81] These applications are known as "divisional applications."[82] If the independence of the inventions be clear, such limitation will be made before any action upon the merits;[83] otherwise it may be made at any time before final action thereon, in the discretion of the examiner.[84] Division under these rules may be required where the structures are unrelated[85] or where the claims relate only to species under a general genus.[86] Division may be, and often is, required years after the application is filed.[87] A requirement of division will not be repeated without the written approval of the examiner of classification.[88] After a final requirement of division, applicant may elect to prosecute one group of claims, retaining the remaining claims in the case with the privilege of appealing from the requirement of division after final action by the examiner on the group of claims prosecuted.[89] A divisional application is a form of amendment.[90] If new matter is embodied in it, the application takes its filing date only from that embodiment.[91] As to anything which is not new matter, the application has the benefit of the filing date of the parent application.[92]

[§ 169] (b) Effect of Inclusion of Void Claim. Some claims made in a patent may be invalid without invalidating the entire patent, since each claim is separately considered and is a separate statement of the field intended to be covered.[93]

[§ 170] 4. Oath. It is provided by statute that applicant shall make oath that he believes himself to be the first inventor of the method or thing for which he solicits a patent; that he does not know and does not believe that the same was ever before known or used; and shall state of what country he is a citizen.[94] If the inventor is dead, the oath must be made by the executor or administrator;[95] and in case the inventor is insane, by his legally appointed representative.[96] Such oath may be made in the United States before any officer authorized to administer oaths; and, if made abroad, before any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States or before any notary public, judge, or magistrate having an official seal and authorized to administer oaths, where authority of the foreign officer shall be proved by a certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States.[97] It has been held that the statute is directory only, that the making of the oath is but a prerequisite to the granting of the patent, and in no degree essential to its validity.[98] But it has been asserted that this doctrine has been overruled and a contrary doctrine established.[99] A patent which is not supported by the oath of the inventor, his executor or administrator, or his legally appointed representative, but is applied for by one who is not the inventor, is unauthorized by law and void.[1] No right as against the public is conferred by a patent issued on the sworn application of one not the inventor whether the patent is taken out in the name of applicant[2] or of any of his assignees.[3] Mere formal defects in the oath do not affect the validity of the patent.[4] The statement of allegiance of applicant is no longer required to be included in the oath but should be stated in the body of the application.[5] It has been held that a misstatement of the citizenship of applicant will not invalidate a patent issued thereon where it does not appear that applicant was guilty of any fraud or that his oath was willfully false.[6] This decision was expressly put upon the ground that a mistake as to applicant's citizenship operated neither to his advantage nor to the detriment of the public, and was a mere formal defect.[7]

Rules of the patent office require that in every original application applicant must distinctly state under oath that to the best of his knowledge and belief the invention has not been in public use or on sale in the United States for more than two years prior to his application, or patented or described in any printed publication in any country before his invention or more than two years prior to his application, or patented in any foreign country on an application filed by himself or his legal representatives or assigns more than twelve months prior to his application in this country.[8] If any application for a patent has been filed in any foreign country by applicant, or by his legal representatives or assigns, prior to his application in this country, he is required by the rules to state the country or countries in which such application has been filed, giving the date of such application, and stating that no application has been filed in any other country or countries than those mentioned.[9] He is also required so to state if no application has been filed in any foreign country.[10] The oath must be in the English language,[11] and must be subscribed to by affiant.[12] If the application be made by an executor or administrator of a deceased person or the guardian, conservator, or representative of an insane person, the oath must allege the relationship of affiant to the inventor,[13] and, upon information and belief, the facts to which the inventor is required by the rules to make oath.[14]

[§ 171] 5. Drawings.[15] The statute governing applications requires applicant to furnish a drawing of his invention whenever the nature of the case admits of it.[16] The drawing may be signed by the inventor or his attorney in fact,[17] or, in case of the inventor's death or insanity, by his proper representative.[18] The drawings must show every feature of the invention covered by the claims.[19] Patent office drawings are not required to be working drawings.[20] They are merely illustrative,[21] and are to be read in the light of the description and claims,[22] and the prior art.[23] Their object is to aid in conveying the idea of the inventor to the skilled in the art.[24] And if, read in connection with the description and claims, they are sufficient for that purpose, it is immaterial so far as the validity of a patent is concerned that they are in some respects inaccurate,[25] incomplete,[26] or otherwise defective.[27] The drawings may be corrected by the patent office to show correctly the invention described in the specification.[28] The rules of the patent office prescribe in detail the size, materials, arrangement, lettering and other matters pertaining to the execution of the drawing.[29]

Improvements. When the invention consists of an improvement of an old machine the drawing must exhibit, in one or more views, the invention itself, disconnected from the old structure, and also, in another view, so much only of the old structure as will suffice to show the connection of the invention therewith.[30]

[§ 172] 6. Models. The statute governing applications provides that in all cases which admit of representation by model, applicant, if required by the commissioner, shall furnish a model of convenient size to exhibit advantageously the several parts of his invention or discovery.[31] This requirement must be complied with.[32] The patent office rules provide that a model will be required or admitted as a part of the application only when, on examination of the case in its regular order, the primary examiner shall find it to be necessary or useful.[33] When a model is required, the examination of the application may be suspended until it shall have been filed.[34] The requisites of the model are the subject of patent office rules.[35]

[§ 173] 7. Specimens of Ingredients and of Composition. The statute provides that, when the invention or discovery is a composition of matter, applicant, if required by the commissioner, shall furnish specimens of ingredients and of the composition, sufficient in quantity for the purpose of experiment.[36] Whether specimens of ingredients and of the composition shall be required or not is discretionary with the patent office.[37]

[§ 174] 8. Fees.[38] The fees to be paid upon making application for any action by the United States patent office are fixed by statute[39] and by the rules of the patent office.[40] Payment in advance of any action by the patent office is required both by statute[41] and by the rules of the patent office.[42] The final fee is required to be paid not later than six months from the time at which the application was passed and allowed and notice thereof sent to applicant or his agent.[43] This means six calendar months, and not six lunar months.[44] The statute provides that the patent shall be withheld if the final fee is not paid within that period.[45] The patent, however, is not subject to collateral attack upon the ground that the final fee was not paid.[46]

Invention dedicated to the public. Provision has been made by congress for the issuance of patents without the payment of any fee where applicant in his application states that the invention described therein, if patented, may be used by the government or any of its officers or employees in the prosecution of work for the government, or by any other person in the United States, without the payment to him of any royalty thereon, which stipulation shall be included in the patent;[47] and the validity of this provision has been sustained.[48]

[§ 175] D. Examination and Proceedings in Patent Office*—1. In General. Upon an application for a patent being properly made,[49] and the required fees being paid,[50] the commissioner of patents is required by statute to cause an examination to be made of the alleged new invention or discovery, and to determine whether claimant is entitled to a patent under the law, and whether it is sufficiently useful and important to warrant the grant of a patent.[51] The commissioner has the only original initiatory jurisdiction that exists up to the granting and delivering of a patent;[52] and it is his duty to decide whether the patent is new, and whether it is the proper subject of a patent;[53] and his action in awarding or refusing a patent is a judicial function[54] which he cannot transfer to those selected to assist in the examination;[55] nor can he constitute them a board of examiners known in law as such.[56] In passing on an application the commissioner should decide not only questions of law, but also of fact,[57] including abandonment or neglect,[58] and whether there had been a prior public use or sale of the article invented.[59]

Effect of examiner's decision. The decision of the examiner or board of examiners is not conclusive upon the commissioner, so as to deprive him of the general power conferred upon him by statute, to satisfy himself, before issuing a patent, that claimant is justly entitled to a patent;[60] and he may refuse a patent allowed by the examiner.[61]

[§ 176] 2. Evidence.[62] In uncontested cases, the evidence upon questions of fact involved in the application is ex parte,[63] and the patent office is not

[a] Statutes.—(1) "By the patent act of 1793 . . . no examination was made by persons qualified to judge whether the alleged invention was new or useful, or had been patented before. That rested wholly on the oath of the applicant. . . . But the act of 4th of July, 1836, introduced a new system, and an entire change in the mode of granting patents. It provided for a new officer, styled a commissioner of patents, to 'superintend, execute, and perform all acts and things touching and respecting the granting and issuing of patents, etc.' The commissioner was authorized to appoint a chief clerk, and three examining clerks, machinist, and other officers. On the filing of an application the commissioner is required to make, or cause to be made, an examination of the alleged invention, in order to ascertain whether the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country, prior to the application; or whether it had been patented in this or any foreign country, or had been on public use or sale, with the applicant's consent, prior to his application; and if the commissioner shall find that the invention is new and useful, or important, he is authorized to grant a patent for the same." Corning v. Burden, 15 How. (U. S.) 252, 269, 14 L. ed. 683. (2) The present statute requires the commissioner to "cause an examination to be made of the alleged new invention or discovery; and, if on such examination it shall appear that the claimant is justly entitled to a patent under the law, and that the same is sufficiently useful and important, the commissioner shall issue a patent therefor." U. S. Code tit 35 § 36.

[b] Order of examination.—Applications filed are classified according to the various arts, and are taken up for examination in the regular order of filing, those in the same class of invention being examined and disposed of, as far as practicable, in the order in which the respective applications are completed. confined to technical evidence in rejecting or allowing applications, but may base its action upon anything which shows the facts with reasonable certainty.[64] The commissioner may take notice of facts adjudicated in the supreme court,[65] and he may also act upon knowledge derived from a search of the records and decisions made in his own department.[66] The attendance of witnesses may be compelled.[67]

Burden of proof. It is incumbent upon applicant to make it appear that he is justly entitled to a patent under the law, and that the invention is sufficiently useful and important to justify the issue of such patent therefor;[68] and where he claims that two statutory inventions constitute one unitary invention, the burden is upon him to prove that fact.[69]

Presumptions. The oath of applicant is prima facie evidence of the invention,[70] and where applicant has complied with all formal requirements, and the commissioner does not find that the invention falls within any of the conditions mentioned in the law as fatal to the grant of a patent, he cannot require additional evidence as to the practical result of the invention;[71] but the commissioner has power and it is his duty to resort to any circumstances legitimately in his possession for the purpose of repelling the presumption.[72]

[§ 177] 3. Suspension of Action. The commissioner may temporarily suspend action on a pending application for what he deems a sufficient reason,[73] and so long as such suspension does not interfere with a positive legal right, the wisdom of the commissioner's action will not be inquired into by the courts.[74]

[§ 178] 4. Allowance of Application. An act of congress expressly provides that if, on examination, it shall appear that claimant is justly entitled to a patent under the law, and that the same is sufficiently useful and important, the commissioner shall issue a patent therefor,[75] except that in case of war the granting of the patent may be withheld until the termination of the war, if the disclosure of the patent might, in the opinion of the commissioner, be detrimental to the public safety or defense, or might assist the enemy or endanger the successful prosecution of the war.[76] And where a substantial and presumably meritorious contribution to a given art is made by an applicant for a patent,[77] and the question of patentability is close, any doubt which arises, whether in the appellate court,[78] or in the patent office, as to the patentability of an invention should be resolved in favor of applicant,[79] especially where his claims are specific.[80] Where, however, applicant has prolonged the prosecution of his application for such a period of years as to indicate a design to delay final action upon it, knowing that the device covered by the application has gone into public use, the commissioner is justified in reversing the ordinary rule by resolving any reasonable doubt against applicant.[81]

[§ 179] 5. Rejection of Application and Notification. If upon such examination it is determined that applicant is not entitled to a patent as claimed, the commissioner should reject the application;[82] and if there is within his knowledge or cognizance any

Cas. 1, 11 (where the court said: "This rule, I suppose, must have been adopted when the applicant had no remedy if the commissioner rejected his claim and the decision of the commissioner was affirmed by the board of examiners, under the seventh and sixteenth sections of the act of July 4th, 1836, which last-mentioned section gave the applicant a remedy by bill in equity only in case the patent was refused on the ground that it would interfere with an unexpired patent previously granted. In all other cases of refusal the applicant had no remedy, whereas, if the patent should be granted, its validity might be at all times questioned in the courts of law. It was reasonable, therefore, to adopt such a rule. But now, by the tenth section of the act of March 3d, 1839, if the patent be refused for any cause either by the commissioner or the judge the applicant may still establish his right to a patent by a bill in equity. The reason of the rule, therefore, fails, and I should not think myself bound by it if I thought this to be a case of doubt, which I do not").

"In case of ordinary doubt, the policy of the patent system, as customarily maintained in the Patent Office, has been to give the applicant the benefit thereof, because no absolute right of property is conferred by the grant of a patent." In re Thomson, 26 App. (D. C.) 419, 425.

substantial or reasonable ground why a patent should not issue, it is his duty to refuse the patent, whether the specific objection has been raised and acted upon by the examiners or not,[83] and especially is it his duty to do so where the primary examiner and the examiners-in-chief have found such ground for refusal to exist.[84] The application may be rejected for want of diligence and abandonment[85] where other patents for the same invention are disclosed;[86] where, on amendment,[87] applicant broadens his claims beyond the scope of his original disclosures;[88] or where it is determined that there has been a prior public use or sale of the invention.[89] But an application should not be rejected on the ground of prior public use and sale, merely upon the ex parte affidavits of persons adverse in interest.[90] Twice returning the specifications and drawings to applicant for nonconformity to the rules of the patent office does not constitute a rejection of the claims.[91]

Notice and reasons. Upon rejection the commissioner must notify applicant thereof, giving him briefly the reasons for such rejection, together with such information and references as may be useful in judging of the propriety of renewing his application or of altering his specifications;[92] but this requirement, as to giving reasons and information, is directory merely and the commissioner's action in the premises is not reviewable.[93]

Reëxamination. If, after receiving notice of rejection, applicant persists in his claim for a patent, either with or without altering his specifications, the commissioner must order a reëxamination of the case.[94]

[§ 180] 6. Amendment of Application[95]—a. Right and Power To Amend—(1) In General. Under the patent office rule that an applicant may amend his application before or after the first rejection or action,[96] and subject to the limitations that the amendment is within the requirements of the statutes and the rules of the patent office,[97] is seasonably made,[98] and is within the scope of the original application,[99] amendments of an application may be made voluntarily and without suggestion of the commissioner or examiner.[1]

By attorney after applicant's death. Where an inventor files an application in his lifetime, an amendment to it within the scope of the original specifications may be made after his death by his attorney without filing a new power of attorney,[2] unless the attorney's authority ceases at applicant's death.[3]

Effect of assignment. An applicant for a patent, although he has assigned his rights under the application, may amend the claims within the scope of the specification;[4] and a formal omission from the specification may be supplied by the assignee.[5]

Correction by patent office. The patent office itself may and should correct a drawing filed, and make it accord with the actual invention as shown by a photograph of the original device.[6]

[§ 181] (2) Where Application Rejected.[7] Where the application has been rejected with a notification thereof giving reasons and objections and citing references,[8] amendments may be made to avoid the references cited or reasons for rejection given;[9] and amendments so made are binding upon applicant in all subsequent proceedings,[10] because if he does

[a] Reasons for rule.—"The law has provided certain official agencies to aid and advance the work of the Patent Office, such as the primary examiners, the examiners of interferences, and the examiners-in-chief; but they are all subordinate, and subject to the official direction of the Commissioner of Patents, except in the free exercise of their judgments in the matters submitted for their examination and determination. The Commissioner is the head of the bureau and he is responsible for the general issue of that bureau. If, therefore, there be any substantial, reasonable ground within the knowledge or cognizance of the Commissioner why the patent should not issue, whether the specific objection be raised and acted upon by the examiners or not, it is his duty to refuse the patent; and especially is it so, when the primary examiner and the examiners-in-chief have found such ground for refusal to exist." not choose to make the amendment he has a remedy by appeal.[11] In making such amendment, applicant must clearly point out all the patentable novelty which he thinks the case presents in view of the state of the art disclosed by the references cited or the objections made;[12] and must also show how the amendments avoid such references or objections.[13]

Effect of acquiescence in rejection. An applicant who acquiesces in the rejection of his claim upon references cited and accepts a patent on an amended claim is thereby estopped from maintaining that the amended claim covers the combinations and devices shown in those references, or that it has the breadth of the rejected claim,[14] but he is not estopped from claiming and securing by an amended claim every improvement and combination he has invented that was not disclosed by the references on which his original claim was rejected.[15]

[§ 182] b. Number of Amendments. Under a rule of the patent office which gives an applicant the right to amend as often as the examiner presents new references or reasons for rejection,[16] whether an applicant, after amending several times, has a further right to amend is a question of practice exclusively within the jurisdiction of the commissioner to determine.[17]

[§ 183] c. Time of Amendment.[18] The application is always open to amendment until the matter is finally disposed of by the patent office by the issuance of a patent,[19] or by a final order of rejection.[20] Mere delay not amounting to an abandonment[21] is no ground for rejecting an amendment,[22] and in the absence of intervening rights does not create an estoppel.[23] But unreasonable delay in making an amendment is a circumstance tending to show that the subject matter of the amendment was not part of the original invention;[24] and where the amendment introduces new matter, it should be carefully scrutinized;[25] and in the absence of an excuse therefor the delay may render the claims, presented by the amendment, invalid on the ground of laches.[26]

[§ 184] d. Scope of Amendment—(1) In General. An application may be amended to set forth more clearly or accurately the invention originally applied for and described,[27] provided the amendment is within the general scope of the claims and specifications as originally disclosed;[28] and such an amendment does not invalidate a patent issued on the amended application.[29] The specifications or drawing may be amended by insertions and changes which are only in amplification and explanation of what already has been reasonably indicated in the disclosure of the invention,[30] even though the change is made with reference to another patent which has been applied for and issued while the application is pending, but subsequent to applicant's invention;[31] and this rule applies with special force where the insertion is required by the patent office.[32] Claims which are too broad may be properly limited by amendment,[33] such as to conform to what, in the opinion of the patent office, is considered patentable.[34] In the absence of intervening rights, claims that are too narrow may be enlarged, and even new claims added, so as to embrace all that was included in the original specifications or drawings;[35] and, under this rule, a claim for a specific device may be broadened by amendment into a generic claim.[36]

Division of claims. By virtue of a rule of the patent office,[37] if a single application claims several inventions and the independence of the inventions is clear, a division of such claims will be required before any action on the merits;[38] and under this rule claims to another invention cannot be inserted in the original application by amendment, but a new and divisional application must be filed.[39]

[§ 185] (2) New Matter. Amendments which enlarge the scope of the original application are generally regarded with jealousy and disfavor,[40] unless they are made before the rights of other parties have intervened.[41] Therefore an amendment which introduces new matter involving a material departure from the invention described in the original specifications, or enlarging the scope of the application, with a view of having it relate back to the original filing date,[42] is generally regarded as invalid and will not be allowed,[43] unless such amendment is supported

"The Patent Office has a strict rule on this subject. It fully recognizes that new matter must not be permitted, and it is constantly engaged in defining what is and what is not new matter. The application of the rule must, of necessity, be more or less arbitrary, and the presumption of correctness which attends Patent Office rulings must apply with especial force to this class of ruling; and most peculiarly is that true when the applicant has only complied with the demands which the Patent Office made." Lotz v. Kenney, 31 App. (D. C.) 205.

[b] Alternative forms.—Where an application presents specific claims to alternative forms, an amendment must confine the claims to one form, with divisional applications filed for other forms. Wagenhorst v. Hydraulic Steel Co., 27 F. (2d) 27.

by the statutory oath.[44] This rule is especially applicable where the new or enlarged claims will interfere with other inventors who have acquired intervening rights.[45] The allowance of such an amendment rests within the sound discretion of the patent office;[46] and in determining whether matter introduced into an application by way of amendment is new matter, the original drawings are to be understood with such variations in form, shape, and proportions as common sense and mechanical skill in the art would suggest.[47]

New application. An applicant, however, advancing enlarged claims may present them in a new and distinct application.[48]

[§ 186] e. Supplemental Oath.[49] An amendment which is within the scope of the original specifications and drawings need not be verified by a new or supplemental oath,[50] although it is made after the death of applicant,[51] and although it is made by applicant's attorney.[52]

Oath required. Where, however, the amendment presents a claim or conception materially different from, or enlarged over, the invention described in the original application, it must be supported by a supplemental oath of the inventor,[53] in the same terms as are required in an original application,[54] the sufficiency of the supplemental oath being a question for the determination of the officials of the patent office.[55] Such oath is required, not because it is to be used for an amended or new claim, but because the amendment tells some fact of invention not told before;[56] and a patent issued on an application so amended without a new verification is invalid.[57] A statement by applicant in such a supplemental

[b] Added claim invalid.—A claim added to an application by amendment, to matter not disclosed in the application as originally filed, is invalid. Boyce v. Stewart-Warner Speedometer Corp., 220 Fed. 118, 136 CCA 72.

[c] Where the mode of operation is the essence of the invention, a new principle or method of operation cannot be introduced by amendment, and be sustained on the original application, to interfere with other inventors who have entered the field in the meantime, although the apparatus itself is left unchanged. American Bell Tel. Co. v. National Tel. Mfg. Co., 109 Fed. 976.

[d] In England the same rule applies. Re British Thomson-Houston Co., Ltd., 89 L. J. Ch. 194.

[e] In Australia, under Patents Act (1903) §§ 71, 78, an amendment is properly disallowed where the invention claimed in the proposed amendment, whether the discovery of a new principle or a mere working direction for the use of existing apparatus, is substantially different from that claimed by the original specification. [a] An applicant may file new claims without verification (1) where they are within the invention as disclosed in the specification and drawings, and narrower than the original claims (General Electric Co. v. Morgan-Gardner Electric Co., 168 Fed. 52, 93 CCA 474 [rev 159 Fed. 951]), (2) or where they are fairly derivable from the sworn disclosure of the original specification (H. J. Wheeler Salvage Co., Inc. v. Rinelli & Guardino, Inc., 295 Fed. 717).

[b] Rule applied.—The fact that there was no claim for a method in the application when it was filed, and that one was added by amendment without a new oath, does not make the patent invalid. H. J. Wheeler Salvage Co., Inc. v. Rinelli & Guardino, Inc., 295 Fed. 717.

[a] Oath of executor to support a proper amendment after the inventor's death is not necessary. De la Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Featherstone, 147 U. S. 209, 13 SCt 283, 37 L. ed. 138.

52. John R. Williams Co. v. Miller, etc., Mfg. Co., 107 Fed. 290. Compare Eagleton Mfg. Co. v. West, etc., Mfg. Co., 111 U. S. 490, 4 SCt 593, 28 L. ed. 493 (where the amendment, made by an attorney, included an invention not before described).

[a] Thus, where an application for a patent is made by the inventor in his lifetime by an attorney, the fact that changes are made by the attorney in the specifications and claims without new oaths will not invalidate the patent, since a discretion as to the allowance of such amendment is vested in the commissioner. Wirt v. Hicks, 45 Fed. 256.

[a] Where an applicant dies pending his application, the authority of his solicitors ceases, and when his administrator carries on the proceedings and amends the specifications by inserting new matter of which there has been no previous suggestion, another oath is essential. Phillips v. Sensenich, 31 App. (D. C.) 159.

oath, that he conceived the subject matter of the amendment prior to the filing of his original application, affords prima facie proof of its truth, which must be overcome by affidavits to the contrary by one who questions its truth.[58]

[§ 187] f. Relation Back. An amendment which is seasonably and properly made[59] relates back and speaks as of the date of the original application, the whole being regarded as one continuous application,[60] except that, where new matter is inserted by amendment, supported by a new affidavit, the application takes filing date only from that embodiment.[61]

[§ 188] 7. Alteration or Substitution. A rule of the patent office provides that an application which has been altered or partly filled up after being signed or sworn to will be stricken from the files.[62] This rule precludes an alteration by the insertion of new and material matter after the application has been signed or sworn to;[63] but does not prevent an attorney from making formal or immaterial changes in an application once sworn to.[64]

Investigation. Whether authorized to do so by this rule or not, the commissioner has power, either in an interference case,[65] or in an ex parte proceeding, to inquire and determine whether an application has been fraudulently altered or substituted without authority;[66] and the acquittal of an applicant indicted with other persons for having conspired fraudulently to alter applications is not a bar to such investigation.[67]

[§ 189] 8. Renewal of Application[68]—a. After Abandonment. Abandonment of the application does not of itself constitute abandonment of the invention,[69] and therefore a new application may thereafter be filed for the same invention.[70] Where a joint application of two parties is filed through inadvertence, it may be abandoned and a new application be filed by the real inventor.[71] The renewal application is generally treated in all respects as a wholly new and original application,[72] which does not relate back to the date of the original application and revive the old application so as to avoid the effect of an intervening public use,[73] or so as to entitle applicant to claim constructive reduction to practice as of his original filing date;[74] but where the new application is made within the statutory period, its original priority is established, notwithstanding intervening claims.[75] Where no testimony is taken on the question of abandonment, the granting of a renewal by the commissioner will rebut any presumption that there was an abandonment, and under such circumstances applicant is entitled to relate back to his original filing date.[76]

Requisites. Where a new application is filed in place of an abandoned one, a new specification, oath, drawing, and fee will be required, but the old model, if suitable, may be used upon the filing of suitable permanent photographic copies thereof.[77]

[§ 190] b. After Rejection or Withdrawal. Where neither the invention nor the application has been abandoned, but the application has been withdrawn or rejected, a new application may be filed to secure a patent for the same invention,[78] provided the renewed application is made within a reasonable time after withdrawal and return of the fee.[79] If the new application is filed without unreasonable delay, that is, within the statutory period after the withdrawal or rejection,[80] or if beyond the statutory period, there is a sufficient excuse for the delay,[81] the original application and the renewed application will be considered as constituting together one continuous application, dating from the filing of the original application,[82] provided the new application is for substantially the same invention as that included in the original application,[83] and the second is merely an amplification of the first.[84] Where an original application disclosing two separate and distinct inventions is pending in the patent office, a divisional application is not regarded as a continuation of the original so as to give applicant the benefit of the filing date of the same;[85] and the issue of a patent on the original application is not action in the case, within the meaning of the statute, so as to entitle applicant to the statutory period from that time further to prosecute his application.[86]

[§ 191] c. After Allowance and Forfeiture. Where an application has been allowed, but has been forfeited by a failure to pay the final fee,[87] under the express provisions of an act of congress,[88] and also under the rules of the patent office,[89] any person interested, whether as inventor, discoverer, or assignee, may file a renewal application for a patent for the same invention,[90] provided it is filed within one year after the allowance of the original application.[91] Under these provisions only one renewal application may be filed,[92] and if it is not filed within the time prescribed, a patent cannot be issued thereon.[93]

By attorney of record. An attorney of record for an applicant who has filed with the original application the customary power of attorney to prosecute the application, containing full power of substitution and revocation and the right to make alterations and amendments therein, has authority to file, on behalf of applicant, a petition for renewal.[94] If he acts without such power of attorney of record, the application is invalid, although subsequently ratified by the patentee.[95]

Scope and sufficiency. Such renewal application may be based on the original application.[96] The oath, petition, specification, drawing, and model of the original application may be used,[97] and a mere petition to renew the original application is sufficient;[98] but it must bear date from the time of renewal and be subject to examination like an original application,[99] and a new fee will be required.[1] The second application, however, is not limited to what was allowed in the first patent, but may embrace the whole invention,[2] and a party filing such a renewal is not estopped from making certain claims in issue by a disclaimer of such claims on the original application, where the public or third persons have not come into possession of the invention.[3]

of fact,[4] and the intention of the party in allowing his former application to be forfeited may be inquired into to determine the question of abandonment,[5] but such inquiry must be directed to the abandonment of the invention in the original application, and not to some other invention that may be described incidentally therein, and made the subject of a new application by the same party, and brought into interference.[6]

[§ 192] 9. Abandonment[7]—a. In General. An application for a patent or invention may be abandoned before the issue of a patent.[8] By express statutory provision and rules of the patent office, an application for a patent will be regarded as abandoned upon the failure of applicant to complete and prepare it for examination within six months after the filing thereof,[9] or upon his failure to prosecute it within six months after any action thereon by the patent office, of which notice has been duly given to him,[10] unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that such delay was unavoidable;[11] or it may be expressly abandoned by applicant's filing in the office a written declaration of abandonment signed by himself and assignee, if any, identifying his application by title of invention, serial number, and date of filing.[12] Under the Nolan Act[13] certain applicants whose applications became abandoned during the World War for want of prosecution are relieved of the burden of showing that the delay was unavoidable;[14] and such provision was within the authority of congress to enact.[15]

Application of provisions and rules. Under these provisions and rules a failure to take such further action for longer than the period of limitation, after application has been finally rejected, and notice thereof received, operates as an abandonment of the application,[16] unless the delay was unavoidable,[17] or unless there was a sufficient excuse for the delay and it was therefore not unreasonable.[18] Prosecution of an application to save it from abandonment must include such proper action as the condition of the case may require;[19] and where an applicant complies with the terms of an order of the commissioner reopening an application for inserting claims, the fact that he adds other claims not expressly authorized does not constitute a failure to prosecute within the meaning of the statute.[20] Where an applicant, on the patent office's requiring a division of claims, cancels claims covering certain matter disclosed, and later files an application, not a divisional application, disclosing the matter covered by the previously canceled claims, he does not thereby abandon such claims[21] or estop himself, after denial of the second application, from applying for a divisional patent covering the matter involved.[22]

Withdrawal. A mere withdrawal of an application does not of itself constitute an abandonment thereof,[23] and this rule has been held to apply, even though a return of the fee is accepted;[24] but as to this there are decisions to the contrary.[25]

The filing of an application in interference does not constitute an abandonment of a prior application merely because the prior application did not disclose the present issue, where it clearly appears that, at the time of filing the prior application, the inventor had a machine showing the invention.[26]

Determination of question. The commissioner has full authority to examine and adjudicate on the question of abandonment,[27] which is a question of fact,[28] and to compel the attendance of witnesses for that purpose;[29] and his ruling upon the question of abandonment of an application is final and conclusive.[30]

[§ 193] b. Delay in Patent Office. Where applicant takes proper action in the prosecution of his application within the time fixed by statute, a delay in the proceedings for which he is not responsible, which is caused in the patent office, does not work an abandonment of the application;[31] nor does it affect the validity of a patent issued on such application;[32] and so long as the statute law is not violated these rules apply even though applicant acquiesces in such delay.[33] Where applicant makes constant and persistent effort to meet every objection in the patent office, one who knows of the application and attempts to delay it cannot claim any equities on the ground of lack of diligence on the part of applicant in pressing the patent to issue.[34]

[§ 194] c. Effect of Abandonment.[35] An abandonment of an application or of claims therein by an applicant for a patent is abandonment to the public,[36] and not to another who claims to be the inventor,[37] but is not a bar to a patent to a later applicant, either as negativing novelty or as a printed publication.[38] Thus, where an inventor files an application, disclosing an invention not embraced in his claims, and allows the statutory period to elapse after the issuance of a patent to another, embracing the matter not so claimed, he in effect dedicates his invention to the public;[39] but where separate applications are made by an inventor for a method and an apparatus patent, the withdrawal or abandonment of one does not affect the validity of a patent granted for the other.[40]

[§ 195] d. Revival or Reinstatement; Unavoidable Delay.[41] Under the statute,[42] if the delay, beyond the prescribed period, in prosecuting the application was unavoidable, the commissioner may revive and reinstate it as a pending application,[43] the test whether the delay was unavoidable being whether applicant used such care and diligence as a prudent and careful person would have used under the circumstances.[44] The commissioner has exclusive authority in such cases to determine whether or not a delay beyond the statutory period was unavoidable,[45] and to revive an abandoned application and issue a patent thereon,[46] and the validity of a patent so issued is not affected by the failure to prosecute the application within the statutory period.[47] Such a revivor is conclusive and binding on the examiner of interferences and the board of examiners-in-chief,[48] and cannot be collaterally attacked in an interfer-

[a] Negligence of attorney.—The negligence of an attorney which works the abandonment of an application under the statute does not constitute unavoidable delay which will avoid the effect of such abandonment as to applicant. Lay v. Indianapolis Brush, etc., Mfg. Co., 120 Fed. 831, 57 CCA 313.

[b] Conclusiveness.—The reinstatement of an application after several years, during which no action had been taken thereon, on a finding by the patent office that the delay was unavoidable, is conclusive on the courts that the application was not abandoned. [c] Rule.—Before an application abandoned by failure to complete or prosecute can be revived as a pending application, it must be shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that the delay in the prosecution of it was unavoidable. Patent Office Rules Oct. 1, 1927, rule 172.

44. In re Mattullath, 38 App. (D. C.) 497.

[a] Excuse as question of fact.—A conclusive presumption against the existence of an acceptable excuse for the delay is not necessarily created by the fact that others have, in the meantime, entered the field and obtained patents, and are reaping the rewards of their efforts. In re Mattullath, 38 App. (D. C.) 497.

[b] Ignorance of fact.—Ignorance by the widow of an applicant for a patent that she could obtain information concerning her husband's application by applying to the patent office, and also that there is an essential difference between a patent and an application for a patent, is ignorance of fact and not of law. In re Mattullath, 38 App. (D. C.) 497.

[§ 196] 10. Interference[50]—a. Definitions and Nature. An interference is a proceeding instituted for the purpose of determining the question of priority of invention between two or more parties claiming substantially the same patentable invention.[51] The proceeding is expressly authorized by act of congress, and is governed by the statute[52] and the rules of the patent office, which relate to interferences,[53] and if there is any antagonism between the statute and the rules, the statute must prevail.[54] An interference is declared between applications rather than between applicants,[55] and is intended to disclose and determine which invention was first produced,[56] and not who has the title.[57]

Senior and junior party. The party to an interference who was first to file his application is generally regarded as the senior party,[58] although while it is pending his rival's application goes to patent.[59] Conversely, a party whose application was filed after that of the other party will be regarded as the junior party, notwithstanding a patent has been issued to him.[60] But the party whose application for a patent is last filed is the senior party to an interference proceeding where his application is for the reissue of a patent issued on an application filed prior to the other party's filing date.[61]

[§ 197] b. When May Be Declared—(1) In General. Under the provisions of the governing statute[62] and rules of practice in the patent office,[63] an interference may be declared when an application is made for a patent or for a reissue of a patent,[64] which, in the opinion of the commissioner, would conflict or interfere with any pending application[65] or with any unexpired patent.[66] The duty of the commissioner to declare an interference arises only when, in the exercise of his judgment upon the facts presented, he is of the opinion that a senior application will be interfered with by a junior one;[67] he is not required so to act upon the mere fact that the junior application covers the same ground,[68] or that the junior application asserts an interference or antagonism.[69]

[§ 198] (2) Essential Elements. It is generally essential that there be two or more claimants for the same invention,[70] and that their claims disclose substantially the same invention, either in whole or in part;[71] but a second application by the same inventor may constitute an interference with a prior ap-

[a] The statute provides that, whenever an application is made for a patent which, in the opinion of the commissioner, would interfere with any pending application, or with any unexpired patent, he shall give notice thereof to applicants, or applicant and patentee, as the case may be, and shall direct the primary examiner to proceed to determine the question of priority of invention. And the commissioner may issue a patent to the party who is adjudged the prior inventor, unless the adverse party appeals from the decision of the primary examiner, as the case may be, within such time, not less than twenty days, as the commissioner shall prescribe. plication by him.[72] It is also essential that there be an actual interference or conflict between the different claims;[73] and whether there is such an interference depends chiefly upon the subject matter disclosed and not merely upon the language of the respective claims,[74] or upon the admissions or denials of the parties.[75]

A prior forfeited application, to justify an award of priority, must disclose the subject matter of the claims in issue.[76]

[§ 199] (3) Between Applicant and Patentee.[77] Under the statute[78] and a rule of the patent office,[79] an interference may be declared between an application and a patent previously granted to another for the same thing,[80] for, although the patent office cannot cancel the patent already issued,[81] it may issue a second patent to the real inventor.[82] The fact that a patent has been issued to one party to an interference proceeding accords no advantage to him in that proceeding if the applications were copending,[83] or if the record of the patent shows that the patentee had no right to make in his application the claims which are the issue of the interference.[84]

Limitation or laches. But an applicant is not entitled to maintain an interference proceeding more than two years after the grant of a patent to the adverse party thereto unless he shows special circumstances justifying the delay.[85]

[§ 200] (4) Successive Interferences or Applications. The power of the commissioner is not exhausted by once deciding a question of interference;[86] but where cause is shown, he may permit the unsuccessful party to withdraw his application, and refile it and then declare anew an interference between the same parties;[87] or a second interference may be declared after the court on appeal has decided in favor of an applicant and ordered that a patent issue to him.[88] But where a party whose application is involved in a pending interference presents another application based upon the invention involved in the interference, he will be refused a patent upon the later application until the interference has terminated.[89]

As rehearing. A second interference is merely a rehearing of the same case, granted, for cause shown, to the losing party,[90] and testimony taken on the former interference is admissible therein,[91] although a new party has been introduced,[92] as the addition of another party does not change the nature of the interference so as to make it entirely a new case, where the subsequent proceedings show it to be a rehearing or new trial as to the original parties as well as to the issues to which the new applicant is to be considered a party.[93]

[§ 201] c. Disclaimer or Waiver. A disclaimer of the invention of the particular matter in issue, in order to avoid the continuance of the interference, as permitted by a rule of the patent office,[94] extends only to the particular claim or claims as to which interference has been declared.[95] But in an interference involving three parties, the junior applicant cannot waive the limitation put upon the senior applicant by his preliminary statement, as to his date of disclosure, although the examiner of interferences and the examiners-in-chief have found in favor of both the senior and junior applicants as against the intermediate applicant.[96]

[§ 202] d. Estoppel To Make Claim.[97] A party may be estopped from making claims in interference by failing to present such claims in an interference proceeding to which he is a party,[98] or by failing to amend his application,[99] or by other conduct during the interference proceeding;[1] and he may also be estopped to claim the benefit of a claim which has been rejected with his acquiescence.[2] But an employee is not estopped from becoming a party to the interference and claiming the invention, by the fact that he had testified in the proceedings for his employer, the senior applicant, to whom he had in good faith assigned the invention;[3] and where a party to an interference has taken steps to apply for a patent, before the corporation of which he is president obtains a license to manufacture the device covered by the other party's patent, such license does not estop him from claiming the invention, but is justifiable for the protection of his interests.[4]

[§ 203] e. Proceedings in General.[5] Interference proceedings in the patent office are of an equitable nature,[6] but must be conducted with due regard to the requirements of the statute[7] and the rules of practice in the patent office affecting such proceedings;[8] and so long as the case is pending, it is within the supervision of the commissioner of patents,[9] who is charged with the duty of seeing that full justice is done.[10] His jurisdiction attaches when he directs the declaration of an interference and extends to the awarding of priority to the successful party after his adversary has been eliminated;[11] but the duty of determining whether an interference exists may be delegated to the primary examiner.[12] Technical objections to papers filed by an opponent should not be sustained, except upon the clearest proof.[13]

Process. A statute providing for the issuance by the clerk of a federal court of subpœnas for witnesses for the taking of testimony for use in any contested case pending in the patent office[14] does not authorize the issuance of a subpœna duces tecum;[15] nor is such a subpœna authorized in such proceedings by a statute[16] which deals only with writs necessary for the exercise by the courts of their own jurisdictions.[17]

Notice of interference. Whenever an interference is declared, notice thereof must be given to applicants, or applicant and patentee as the case may be, whereupon the examiner proceeds to determine the question of priority.[18]

A motion to reopen an interference proceeding, so that applicant might substitute an earlier application, is an admission that the subject matter of all the counts in the interference are the same.[19]

[§ 204] f. Preliminary Statement—(1) In General. Generally speaking, there are no pleadings in an interference case;[20] but under a rule of the patent office,[21] each party, within the time designated in the notice of interference, must make and file in the patent office a preliminary statement which corresponds to and constitutes the pleading in the case,[22] and which contains a concise statement under oath setting forth the dates of the original conception, the making of drawings and models, the first disclosure to others, the reduction to practice, and showing the extent of the use of the invention.[23] In such statement a party must present for determination all of his claims relating to the interfering subject matter,[24] and if he fails to do so, and furthermore fails to file any amendment containing additional claims, he becomes barred and is estopped from subsequently presenting such claims as a basis for another in-

Patent Office Rules, rule 95 [quot Ewing v. U. S., 244 U. S. 1, 7, 37 SCt 494, 61 L. ed. 955].

[b] Failure to prepare.—"Whenever the claims of the co-pending applications differs in phraseology they must be brought to expression substantially in the same language and claims may be suggested to the applicants and if not followed the invention covered by them shall be considered as disclaimed. The declaration of an interference will not be delayed by the failure of a party to put his claim in condition for allowance." Ewing v. U. S., 244 U. S. 1, 7, 37 SCt 494, 61 L. ed. 955.

terference with the other party's application.[25] A disclosure of the counts in issue by the prior inventor may be sufficient to sustain his rights, although his disclosure is less efficient than that of the subsequent inventor.[26]

[§ 205] (2) Amendment of Preliminary Statement. By virtue of a rule of the patent office,[27] the patent office tribunals may, in their discretion, permit a party, on motion, to amend his preliminary statement so as to correct a material error which has occurred through an honest inadvertence or mistake,[28] but the motion to correct such error must be made, if possible, before the taking of any testimony and as soon as possible after the discovery of the error.[29] The commissioner's action in allowing or refusing such an amendment will not be disturbed on appeal, unless there has been an abuse of discretion causing a palpable miscarriage of justice,[30] and error, if any, in permitting an amendment may be waived by a failure to object to evidence introduced under the amended statement.[31]

Changing date. A motion for leave to amend such statement so as to change the date of disclosure made after applicant has seen the adverse party's statement should be carefully scrutinized,[32] and should not be granted unless the interests of justice plainly require it,[33] or unless the testimony to support it is convincing and free from suspicion;[34] and where leave to make such an amendment is obtained on affidavits which are later shown to have been at least mistakenly made, the amended preliminary statement should be stricken out.[35] Where the other party is permitted to amend so as to show an earlier date, the prior party under the original statements may likewise amend.[36]

[§ 206] g. Amendment of Application during Interference[37]—(1) In General. Under a rule of the patent office,[38] a party to an interference may file an amendment to his application, containing any claims which in his opinion should be made the basis of an interference between himself and any of the other parties,[39] provided such amendment is filed within thirty days after the preliminary statements have been received and approved,[40] or when a motion for dissolution is made.[41] It is the duty of the examiner of interferences to transmit the claims thus proposed to the primary examiner for his determination;[42] and if the claims are allowed, the interference will be redeclared, or other interferences will be declared, to include the new claims.[43] After a successful contest in interference, the successful applicant cannot, without changing his specification, broaden his claims to include something not shown or claimed in his original application, but which is claimed in the interfering application;[44] and the losing party is not entitled to make claims that will dominate the claims given to his successful rival.[45]

Where a joint application is involved, the prior inventor, who is found to be the sole inventor, should be given an opportunity to amend his application, or to file a new application so as to protect his rights as sole inventor;[46] and where, in such a case, the sole inventor files a separate application, he is entitled to the date of the joint application for reduction to practice, as the application of the sole inventor is an amendment of the joint application and relates back to the time of the filing of the original application;[47] but in seeking to correct his own mistake in filing the application jointly with another, he must act with reasonable diligence and assume the burden of establishing his good faith.[48]

[a] Thus, where, by mistake and without fraudulent intention, a patent application filed by two inventors embraced an invention of which one of them was sole inventor, a new application, filed by him, should have been treated as a continuation of the original application, and hence not barred by an interfering patent issued more than two years prior to its filing. 48. In re Roberts, supra.

ence in a drawing, made by the draughtsman, should, without amendment, be disregarded in proceedings for interference;[49] but if, after an applicant has obtained an award in interference, the commissioner discovers a mistake in the drawings which show that the device is inoperative, he may refuse to grant applicant a patent, unless the mistake is corrected.[50]

Laches; estoppel. A party to an interference is not estopped from amending his application before the other party has filed his application;[51] and whether, in other cases, a party is estopped to amend or make new claims depends upon whether the adverse litigant or the public will be injured thereby.[52] A motion to amend an application to carry back the alleged date of reduction to practice to a date prior to the opponent's filing date may properly be denied where it is not made until after the taking of testimony is completed.[53]

[§ 207] (2) Copying Claims. Where an application in interference discloses, although it does not formally claim, matter contained in a patent issued to the other party, such matter may be copied from the patent, in amendment of the application.[54] Where, however, the claims involved are substantially different and are not disclosed in the application, applicant is not entitled to copy them from the patent and make them his claims in interference;[55] nor is he entitled to make or be awarded a claim that will dominate the invention covered by the patent.[56]

Reference to prior patent. It is sufficient for applicant in a subsequent specification to incorporate, by reference to a prior patent, the detailed disclosure in that patent,[57] and the subsequent application thereby contains a sufficient disclosure to support the count in issue in interference proceedings, if the intended method of operation is indicated and the reference for detail is sufficient.[58]

Limitation as to time. Under the statute limiting the time for filing an application after a prior patent or prior public use,[59] unless, in the party's original application, which antedated the patent, there was a claim for the same subject matter,[60] the copying of claims must be made within two years after the issuance of the prior patent;[61] and one having an application for a patent pending has constructive notice of the issuance of a patent to another containing claims which he subsequently attempts to make.[62] Where the inventor proceeds within the statutory period, his right to priority in interference cannot be denied, on the theory that his failure to copy claims of the other party sooner was injurious to the latter's rights, by inducing him to use the invention.[63]

[a] Consideration of injury.—Where, after an interference has been decided against him, an applicant presents his application in new form but without changing the substance, the commissioner in passing on such application represents the adverse litigant in the previous interference proceeding and the public, and therefore may consider the injury to the adverse litigant and the public as establishing estoppel to make the new claims. In re Henderson, 50 App. (D. C.) 191, 269 Fed. 707 [certiorari den 256 U. S. 699 mem, 41 SCt 537 mem, 65 L. ed. 1177 mem].

[b] Failure to move to amend.—Where M filed an application, placed in interference with applications of D and G, and subsequently filed another application, claiming different features of the same subject matter, which claims were readable on the specification of G, later given a patent covering such claims, and M failed to move under Patent Office Rules, rule 109 to amend his first application, so as to bring such claims into interference, and there was a decision of a patent office tribunal, from which he took no appeal, in favor of D whose specification did not disclose such features, M was not estopped by laches from making the claims, as his failure to move under rule 109 was not shown to have resulted in injury to anyone. In re Martin, 48 App. (D. C.) 187.

[c] Delay in making new claims.—Where a party, defeated in an interference proceeding, takes the full time allowed him for presenting new claims, as a result of which the successful party's time for applying for a reissue to cover the new claims has expired, he is estopped en pais from making the new claims. Jannson v. Larsson, 30 App. (D. C.) 203. 60. Bancel v. Meier, 54 App. (D. C.) 257, 296 Fed. 1004.

[a] Rule applied.—Where in interference proceedings involving both apparatus and method claims, the senior party is entitled to make the apparatus claims, he may also make the method claims, notwithstanding a delay of more than two years in copying such claims after another patent embodying them has been issued, where the method is an inherent part of the apparatus, and anyone using the apparatus must use the method. [a] Thus, in an interference proceeding, an applicant for a patent, more than three years and six months after the issuance of a patent on a copending application, is not entitled to copy the claim of such patent. Craig v. Mayer, 56 App. (D. C.) 158, 11 F. (2d) 207.

[b] Copying within limitation.—The prior inventor does not lose his right by delay in taking the claims in issue from the application of the other party for twenty months after that application was filed and fifteen months after the prior inventor had knowledge thereof, since such claims were taken well within the two-year period allowed by the rule, as construed by the supreme court. Ransdall v. Jahns, 51 App. (D. C.) 3, 273 Fed. 365.

[c] After original issuance of patent.—Where claims in a patent issued in 1909 were appropriated by H, and, on interference, awarded to him, D could not make such claims more than two years after the issuance of the patent in 1909, although within two years after the issuance of the patent to H. [a] Reason for rule.—An inventor's right to his invention "is a statutory one, and, though the inventor delay in making his application until the last moment allowed him

[§ 208] (3) Divisional Applications. Where a part only of an application is involved in an interference, applicant may withdraw from his application the claims adjudged not to interfere, and file a new application therefor, or he may file a divisional application for the subject matter involved, if the invention can be legitimately divided.[64] But, except where the inclusion of new matter is permitted, a divisional application is limited to the invention disclosed by the original application;[65] and no claim can be made in either application broad enough to include matter claimed in the other.[66] It has been held that a divisional application so filed while the original application is pending constitutes a continuation of the original application,[67] and therefore relates back to its filing date,[68] and thus gives applicant the benefit of his original application as a constructive reduction to practice in a subsequently declared interference.[69]

Limitation as to time. Notwithstanding the provision requiring an application to be completed and prepared for examination within six months after the filing thereof,[70] under the statutory provisions relating to the filing of an application after a prior patent or public use,[71] in the absence of special circumstances excusing delay, a divisional application may and must be filed within two years after the issuance of the patent covering the same subject matter.[72] It has been held that this rule applies, even though the claims of the intervening patent are claimed as well as disclosed in the original application, by claims which were required to be canceled;[73] and it has also been held that, where an invention is not only disclosed in the original application, but is substantially claimed, although in an unscientific way, a failure to file a divisional application until it is suggested by the patent office is not laches which invalidates the patent therefor.[74]

[§ 209] h. Construction of Claims and Issues[75]—(1) In General. In determining the right of either party to make the claims in issue, and the question of priority between them,[76] real, and not artificial, distinctions must be found in the involved applications,[77] and to this end the claims in issue must be reasonably construed in the light of the specifications of the party who first made the particular claims,[78] and of the rule that an inventor is entitled to all the uses of which his invention is capable, whether fully described or not.[79] If possible, the claims should be given an interpretation consistent with the specification in which they originated,[80] and with the evident meaning intended by the party first making them.[81]

After a patent has been issued, the claims in interference should be so interpreted, if possible, as to protect the patentee;[82] and therefore claims copied from a patent for the purpose of securing an interference must be interpreted in the light of the patent disclosure,[83] and every doubt should be resolved in by the statute, his right 'may not be denied or diminished on the ground that such delay may have been prejudicial to either public or private interests.'" Harbridge v. Perrin, 54 App. (D. C.) 106, 109, 295 Fed. 927 [certiorari den 264 U. S. 597 mem, 44 SCt 454 mem, 68 L. ed. 868 mem, and quot Chapman v. Wintroath, 252 U. S. 126, 40 SCt 234, 64 L. ed. 491].

[b] Estoppel.—The fact that an apparatus, for which a patent application is pending, has been in public use for more than two years, does not estop applicant from copying claims from an interfering application, the patent on which has been issued less than two years before he copies the claims. "A prior patent is in no sense a bar to the granting of a second patent for the same invention to an earlier inventor, provided that his application is filed not more than two years after the date of the conflicting patent. The applicant may not be able to prove that he was the first inventor but the statute gives him two years in which to claim that he was and in which to secure the institution of an interference proceeding in which the issue of priority between himself and the patentee may be determined in a prescribed manner." Chapman v. Wintroath, supra.

[a] Thus, where the claims of the patent of the senior party to an interference are bodily incorporated into the junior party's application after the issue of the patent, for the purpose of provoking the interference, the counts of the issue thus formed are to be construed in the light of the favor of patentability, especially where priority has been established.[84]

Elimination of party. The elimination from interference proceedings of the originator of the application which stated the claims does not affect the rule that the claims must be construed in the light of the specifications,[85] so that it is error to limit interfering claims after the elimination of the originator in a manner which excludes his specifications.[86]

[§ 210] (2) Broad Construction. Moreover the claims must be given the broadest interpretation which the language in which they are expressed will reasonably support;[87] and if they are susceptible of a broad interpretation they must be assumed to have been selected for the purpose of covering the invention broadly.[88] The construction, however, should not be so broad as to permit a party to claim a device or invention not disclosed by his specifications.[89] The employment of the same language in describing two structures that are not the same does not necessarily prove that there is an interference in fact.[90]

[§ 211] (3) Limitations. Where there is no ambiguity in the claims, and they are capable of a broad construction,[91] limitations will not be read into them which are not expressed therein,[92] in order to meet the exigencies of a particular situation,[93] or so as to save a claim from destruction.[94] A limitation should not be arbitrarily read into a claim, which will deprive a prior inventor of his discovery or thereafter harass him,[95] or defeat the claim of the party with whom it originated.[96] But whenever it is necessary to preserve its validity, the construction of a claim may be narrowed;[97] and limitations or restrictions which are disclosed in a party's application or counts must be considered as being material to the invention covered thereby,[98] and must not be disregarded to such party's disadvantage.[99]

[§ 212] i. Issues Involved. The sole ultimate issue to be determined in an interference proceeding is the priority of invention as between the parties specifications of the senior party's patent. Bourn v. Hill, 27 App. (D. C.) 291.

[b] Claims directed to an article, instead of a process, should be so construed as to read on the completed article. McIntyre v. Dodge, 29 F. (2d) 861; Shaver v. Newdick, 40 App. (D. C.) 273.

[c] An issue which involves priority only will not be strictly construed as against one of the parties because his machine, upon which he relies to show reduction to practice, was in public use for more than two years before his application was filed. Johnson v. Martin, 41 App. (D. C.) 502.

to the interference;[1] and is not merely a claim which is distinct and separable from other claims, which are or may be made on the same disclosure.[2] The issue of priority is limited to the claims as drawn by the parties to the proceeding,[3] and does not include priority under other and different claims.[4]

Incidental or ancillary issues. Before the issue of priority can be determined, however, it may be, and usually is, necessary to decide one or more incidental or ancillary questions, which for the time being, at least, may become the sole issue.[5] For example, it may be necessary to determine the right of one of the parties to make the claims of the issue;[6] such as which party procured from the other the idea of the invention,[7] and whether there has been a reduction to practice.[8] It has also been held that the question of abandonment of invention by one applicant is always available as affecting his right to priority.[9]

Diligence. The question of diligence is involved where the matter in issue is reduction to practice;[10] but not where the issue presented is one of originality, and not one of independent invention.[11]

[§ 213] j. Issues Not Involved. It has been held that the following questions will not be determined in an interference proceeding: The respective merits of the rival devices;[12] whether either of the parties will ultimately have a right to a patent under his pending application;[13] whether the disclosure in a party's application is sufficient;[14] whether an applicant's right to a patent has been barred by prior public use for more than the statutory period;[15] whether the party entitled to priority had knowledge of the invention disclosed in a prior application, which did not claim it, so as to prevent the issuance of a patent to him;[16] or whether a party was guilty of delay in filing his application for a reissue.[17] As between a patentee and an applicant for a reissue, the former has no right to raise the question of intervening rights;[18] and as between an applicant for an original patent and an applicant for reissue, the objections that the reissue application sought to broaden the claims more than two years after the original patent was granted, and that it was for a different invention, are not available to the original applicant.[19]

Patentability. As a general rule the question of patentability[20] is not involved and cannot be determined in an interference proceeding,[21] since the Racine Paper Goods Co., 181 Fed. 394 (holding that, under rule 126, which provides that interference proceedings may be suspended where an issue is made against one applicant on the ground that he is barred by the statute from the right to a patent because of prior use for more than two years, until such issue has been tried, the action of the patent office in ignoring such an issue, which when made becomes the primary and paramount issue, or in referring it for an ex parte hearing, and in issuing the patent without any finding thereon, was unauthorized by law).

[a] Rule applied.—An issue in interference, which involves the question of priority only, will not be strictly construed as against one of the parties because his machine, upon which he relies to show reduction to practice, was in public use for more than two years before his application was filed. interference is declared on the assumption that the claims are patentable, and that assumption is not open to attack,[22] and the question of patentability may be raised in the patent office against the successful party, after the determination of the interference proceeding.[23] But it has been held that the patent office need not declare an interference until patentability has been determined;[24] that the practice of the patent office in deciding as to the patentability of the invention before declaring an interference is proper, and should be strictly observed;[25] and that such a decision, being important to the subsequent steps to be taken by the parties, should be made with deliberation.[26]

Improvement. Where the issue is a basic claim, one of the parties cannot successfully support a contention that there is no interference in fact by showing that his device is an improvement on that of the other party;[27] for if his device is an improvement, he is entitled to claim it specifically as such, but not broadly.[28]

Priority of a third person who is not a party to the interference proceedings is not involved in such proceeding,[29] and one of the parties to such proceeding cannot defeat an award of priority to the other party by showing that some third person was in fact the first and original inventor,[30] but the junior applicant cannot object that the record shows that the senior applicant was not in fact the real inventor.[31]

[§ 214] k. Proof and Variance—(1) In General. A party to an interference is held strictly to his preliminary statement as to matters of proof,[32] and the evidence in such proceeding must be pertinent to the issue;[33] and where the issue is specific, testimony as to the invention must correspond in every detail with the requirements of the issue.[34] But by express rule of the patent office the preliminary statement cannot be used as evidence in behalf of the party making it.[35] The junior party has the burden of proving his case;[36] and the party who was the first to file an allowable application is not put to his proof until his adversary has introduced evidence showing his own independent conception of the invention prior to that date.[37]

[§ 215] (2) As to Dates.[37½] As a general rule, the parties are limited, in their proof, to the dates set out in their preliminary statements, in respect of disclosure and reduction to practice;[38] and this rule will not be ignored, even with the consent of counsel, unless expressly approved by the commissioner or his representatives,[39] especially where leave to file an amended preliminary statement has been refused.[40] Thus, as a general rule, a party will not be permitted to prove and rely on a date earlier than alleged in his preliminary statement,[41] even though the testimony shows an earlier date,[42] unless an amendment of the statement in this regard has been allowed;[43] and while cases may arise where the interest of the parties and the public will be best subserved by permitting earlier dates to be proved, this should be done under the supervision of, and with the approval of, the patent office.[44] But a party may show that his reduction to practice was at a later date than that alleged in his preliminary statement, if no prejudice will result to the other party.[45] If neither party makes any effort to support his preliminary statement as to the date of his reduction to practice, but the proof of both parties is of a reduction several months later than is alleged therein, this fact indicates a looseness of assertion in the preliminary statements, which tends to discredit both parties.[46]

[§ 216] 1. Evidence. The burden of proof in an interference proceeding is upon the junior applicant to show conception prior to that of his adversary, and either actual reduction to practice, or diligence in reducing to practice prior to the filing date of his adversary.[47] But where the evidence produced by the junior applicant sustains this burden prima facie, the burden of producing evidence that he made the invention at an earlier date is upon the senior applicant.[48] A party to an interference proceeding who takes no testimony is restricted to his filing date for conception and reduction to practice.[49] A party whose application was not filed until after the issuance of a patent covering the invention to the adversary party must sustain this burden by proof establishing his priority beyond a reasonable doubt.[50] But where the applications of the parties are copending in the patent office, a preponderance of the credible evidence is sufficient to sustain the burden.[51] This is so, even though a patent was issued on the earlier application.[52] The burden of proof on the party to an interference who was the last to file an application is greatly increased by concurrent decisions of the several tribunals of the patent office in favor of his opponent,[53] or by long delay in making application.[54] The established rules of evidence govern the admissibility of evidence in interference proceedings.[55] Thus the proofs must conform to the issue,[56] and must relate to the rights of the parties involved.[57] Evidence of conduct on the part of a party inconsistent with his claim to priority may, of course, be shown.[58] Thus it may be shown that a party signed his opponent's application,[59] witnessed his opponent's caveat,[60] or that he took an assignment from him.[61] The prejudicial effect of witnessing the caveat of an adversary in an interference is not avoided by the failure of the caveat to disclose the whole issue, where the part omitted is well-known to both parties at the time.[62] A patentee is a competent witness in his own behalf,[63] but his uncorroborated testimony is not sufficient to establish conception of the invention,[64] or its reduction to practice.[65] Corroboration by independent circumstances is necessary.[66] This rule, however, does not extend to facts and circumstances having no connection with the facts of conception and reduction to practice, and which are of a character readily susceptible of rebuttal or contradiction.[67] In such cases the testimony of the patentee may be considered and weighed like that of any other interested witness.[68] Corroboration of the testimony of a party may exist in established circumstances admitting of satisfactory inferences.[69] Memoranda used by one of the parties while testifying in his own behalf, for the purpose of refreshing his memory, do not have the effect of corroborating his testimony within the rule that the uncorroborated testimony of a party to an interference is insufficient to establish priority of invention.[70] Failure of a party to rebut testimony of his adversary that he had fully disclosed the invention to him furnishes convincing evidence that he is not the prior inventor.[71] This rule, however, does not apply where there is no evidence of a complete disclosure, and merely unsatisfactory evidence of a partial disclosure.[72] The failure of a party to call as a witness one to whom he claims to have disclosed the invention, or to give any reason for his failure, may be considered as tending to discredit his testimony.[73] Where each of two parties to an interference claims a disclosure to the other, the presumption is in favor of the one who has a practical knowledge of the art, and against the one who has not such knowledge.[74] Special rules have been established by the commissioner of patents for taking and transmitting testimony in interferences.[75] Evidence will not be considered on the hearing which shall not have been taken and filed in compliance with these rules.[76] Technical objections, however, must be taken before hearing.[77] Under the rules of the patent office, testimony taken in an interference proceeding may be used in any other and subsequent interference proceeding, so far as relevant and material, subject, however, to the right of any contesting party to recall witnesses whose depositions had been taken, and to take other testimony in rebuttal of the depositions.[78] This rule is applicable, even though a new party is added.[79]

[§ 217] m. Hearing. In determining the issues in interference, the commissioner may look to the records of his own department and the reports and decisions of courts in cases relating to actions therein, without pleading,[80] as well as hear testimony of the parties,[81] and, in a proper case, may deny leave to take testimony;[82] and the rule which requires a party to examine all his witnesses in chief before closing his opening examination[83] does not apply.[84] Where the appellate court reverses a decision of the commissioner granting a motion for an award on the record, without, however, making any award of priority, the senior party has the right to proceed upon the issues of fact by moving for leave to take testimony;[85] and this right is not lost by his having entered into a stipulation with the junior party which relates merely to the identity of the parties, and adds no material fact not admitted by the motion itself, and contains nothing to show that it was intended to be an agreed case.[86]

Armstrong v. Levy, 29 F. (2d) 953. (2) A former adjudication against the patentability of claims, made on motion of one of the parties in interference to dissolve on that ground, does not conclude the question of patentability. Consolidation. Where the same subject matter is in three separate interferences, they may be properly consolidated, in accordance with the practice in the patent office, for hearing and determination as one.[87]

Continuance or suspension. The question of extending the time for hearing the case,[88] and for taking testimony therein,[89] is within the discretion of the commissioner. The commissioner may temporarily suspend the proceedings pending the determination of questions of patentability;[90] but not for the purpose of considering public use or intervening rights, as these questions cannot properly be considered.[91]

[§ 218] n. Decision or Award; Discretion of Patent Office—(1) In General. It is a matter within the sound discretion and judgment of the patent office tribunals, applying the rules of construction heretofore considered,[92] whether to declare an interference,[93] and to determine, upon the facts presented, questions arising in an interference proceeding,[94] and to decide which of the parties is entitled to make the claims in issue and be awarded priority as being the first and original inventor.[95] The party claiming actual reduction to practice is generally entitled to an award of priority, where he makes out a prima facie case which is not rebutted by the other party.[96] A senior applicant may be entitled to priority as to a process, notwithstanding a decision denying priority to him as to an apparatus for carrying out such process.[97]

Control of discretion. The commissioner's discretion in such cases cannot be controlled by mandamus;[98] and mandamus will not lie to vacate an order declaring an interference, on the ground that the discontinuance of a prior interference is res judicata as to the present interference,[99] as that defense can be raised and preserved at all stages of the interference proceeding.[1]

[§ 219] (2) Award on Record. The commissioner, in a proper case, may award priority on the record to the senior applicant,[2] as, where the claims involved do not distinguish in any substantial and patentable way between the structures of the two parties, the senior party may properly be allowed to make the claims.[3] But where the application of the senior party does not meet the issues of some of the counts, priority as to those counts may be awarded to the junior applicant.[4]

Failure to file statement. Under a rule of the patent office,[5] if a party, other than the senior party, fails to file a preliminary statement after due notice,[6] or his statement fails to overcome a prima facie case made by the respective dates of the applications,[7] a judgment of priority may, in the discretion of the commissioner, be awarded against him, unless he shows cause why such action should not be taken.[8]

Motion for judgment on record. A motion by the senior party for a judgment on the record, in view of the record dates of the parties and the allegations of the junior party in his preliminary statement, is in the nature of an exception to the sufficiency of such preliminary statement,[9] and is analogous to an exception to the answer for insufficiency, which is common in equity practice.[10]

[§ 220] (3) Effect of Decision[11]—(a) Refusal To Declare Interference. A refusal to declare an interference is not a denial of a junior party's right to challenge the senior party's right to make the claims,[12] as the junior party has a remedy in such a case by an application ex parte,[13] or by a resort to equity under the statute relating to interfering patents,[14] to determine the priority of invention.[15] So, also, a failure to declare an interference between a senior application and a patent issued to a junior applicant will not deprive the senior applicant of the opportunity of having the question of priority determined,[16] notwithstanding he failed to copy the junior applicant's claims within the statutory period from the issuance of the patent to the junior applicant.[17] A failure to declare an interference when a patentee is seeking a reissue pending an application by another is not a decision that the claims are for different inventions.[18]

[§ 221] (b) Of Award of Priority. Under the rules and practice of the patent office, the decision of the examiner of interferences on a declared interference determines only the question of priority of invention as between the parties to the interference,[19] and does not necessarily entitle the party in whose favor it is made to a patent.[20] The party against whom the decision is rendered may still contend that there is no interference in fact or that the successful party is not entitled to the claims made,[21] and he is not concluded upon the question of his right to a patent until the expiration of the time allowed him by statute for an appeal from the final order rejecting his application,[22] but he has no right thereafter to prosecute the claims of the issue in an ex parte proceeding.[23]

Res judicata.[24] A judgment awarding priority in interference is entitled to great weight, if not controlling in subsequent controversies between the parties on the patents involved.[25] A judgment awarding priority in interference is not res judicata in a suit in equity by the losing party, instituted under the statute,[26] to compel the issuance of the patent refused in the patent office;[27] but is final in a second interference proceeding therein as between the applications,[28] and therefore bars a further interference between the parties upon an issue which covers the common patentable subject matter;[29] and the fact that it is not final in the former interference does not affect its finality in the latter.[30]

[§ 222] o. Dissolution of Interference. Under the rules of the patent office,[31] questions as to the regularity or propriety of the interference must be raised, by motion to dissolve the interference,[32] within thirty days after the statements of the parties have been received and approved,[33] and a failure to make such a motion within the time allowed estops a party from raising objections which might have been made the ground for the motion,[34] unless a good reason is shown for the failure to make such motion,[35] the determination of whether such good reason exists being largely within the discretion of the patent office.[36] A person to whom a patent is issued upon his application cannot object to the dissolution of an interference, as he has obtained all to which he is entitled.[37]

On commissioner's own motion. The commissioner, in the exercise of his supervisory authority, may dissolve interference on his own motion if it clearly appears that one of the parties thereto has no right to make the claim,[38] or that the issues are barred by public use.[39]

[a] Rules held reasonable.—Under Patent Office Rules Oct. 1, 1927, rule 122, parties to an interference who would question the right of an adversary to make the claims at the issue are required, if possible, to file their motion to dissolve not later than the thirtieth day after the statements of the parties have been received and approved, and such a motion must be accompanied by a motion to transmit the question to the primary examiner for initial determination. Rule 130 permits a party to allege the nonpatentability of the claims of his opponent at final hearing before the examiner of interferences, and, upon appeals from his decision, only in the event that such party has complied with the provisions of rule 122, "or shown good reason why such a motion was not presented and prosecuted." [a] Illustrations.—(1) A failure to move for dissolution of interference on the ground of nonpatentability of the other party's claim disentitles a party to question his adversary's right to make claim on the ground of nonpatentability thereof, under Patent Office Rules Oct. 1, 1927, rule 130. Harvey v. Short, 55 App. (D. C.) 199, 4 F. (2d) 165. (2) A failure to move to dissolve an interference on the ground that an accepted amendment to one of the applications involves new matter is an acquiescence in the allowance of the amendment. [b] Rule not applicable.—Where a party to an interference does not question the right of others to priority, there can be no award of priority in his favor, and his motions to dissolve do not therefore relate to priority, but to the propriety of the declaration of interference, and do not come within Patent Office Rules Oct. 1, 1927, rule 130. an interlocutory character,[40] and cannot be considered on appeal from the decision of the commissioner awarding priority to one of the parties to the interference.[41] Where the right of one party to make the claims of the issue is presented on the motion to dissolve, two questions arise, namely, the right to make the claims, and priority of invention.[42]

Effect of decision on motion. If the motion to dissolve is denied by the commissioner, the soundness of his ruling is a question ancillary to the final judgment of priority,[43] and may be considered on an appeal from the final award of priority,[44] unless the appeal is abandoned, in which case the decision is a final adjudication between the parties.[45] If a motion to dissolve the interference, on the ground of want of right to make the claim, is decided adversely to claimant, the formal award of priority goes to his opponent as a matter of course.[46] If decided in his favor, the issue of priority in fact is to be determined also before the decision becomes final;[47] and if the commissioner decides that the claims can be made, and the question of priority is determinable on the record, it can be awarded at the same time.[48] But if the motion is sustained, without an award of priority, the interference is ended and no cause of action survives or exists upon which an award of priority can be based.[49]

[§ 223] 11. Appeals in Patent Office. By act of congress and rules of the patent office, every applicant for a patent, or for the reissue of a patent,[50] any of whose claims have been twice rejected, and every party to an interference,[51] upon paying the required fee therefor, may appeal from the decision of the primary examiner, or of the examiner in charge of interferences to the board of appeals,[52] composed of the commissioner of patents, the first assistant commissioner, the assistant commissioners, and the examiners-in-chief.[53] The procedure on such appeals is governed by the rules of the patent office adopted to comply with the statute as amended,[54] except that cases in which appeals were pending and heard prior to such amendment are governed by the rules which were in effect at that time.[55] The terms of a statute providing for such appeals should receive a reasonable interpretation,[56] and be so construed as to avoid multiplying litigation or producing unnecessary delay and expense to the parties concerned, and to prevent, as far as possible, embarrassment and hindrance to the proceedings in the patent office.[57]

[§ 224] 12. Appeals from Decisions of Patent Office—a. In General. The right of appeal from a decision of the patent office is purely statutory.[58] By act of congress, if an applicant for a patent or a party to an interference is dissatisfied with the decision of the board of appeals. he may appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia;[59] and a statute permitting such appeals has been held

[a] Prior statutes.—(1) Under an act of congress passed in 1836, appeals from decisions of the commissioner of patents were to a board of examiners composed of three disinterested persons appointed by the secretary of state. Act July 4, 1836 (5 St. at L. 119 c 357 §§ 7, 8). (2) For this tribunal the act of 1839 substituted the chief justice of the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia. Act March 3, 1839 (5 St. at L. 353 c 88 §§ 11, 12). (3) The act of 1852 provided that an appeal might also be taken to either of the assistant judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and imposed and conferred upon each of them the powers and duties given by the previous act to the aforesaid chief justice. Act Aug. 30, 1852 (10 St. at L. 75 c 107 §§ 1, 2). (4) Under the act of 1861 appeal was to the circuit court judges, but only from the decisions of the commissioner of patents, and not from the decision of a primary examiner. It was necessary under this act for applicant to go from the primary examiner by appeal to the examiner-in-chief, from the latter by appeal to the commissioner, and lastly from the commissioner to the judges of the circuit court. Act March 2, 1861 (12 St. at L. 246 c 88 §§ 2, 3). And see Snowden v. Pierce, 22 F. Cas. No. 13,151, 2 Hayw. & H. 386. (5) This system continued in force until, by the act of 1870, incorporated in the United States revised statutes, the final appellate jurisdiction was vested in the supreme court of the District of Columbia sitting in banc, the intermediate appeals remaining as before. Act July 8, 1870 (16 St. at L. 198 c 230); U. S. Rev. St. §§ 409–411. (6) The act of 1893, however, relieved the supreme court of the District of Columbia of the determination of appeals from the decision of the commissioner of patents, and vested such appellate jurisdiction in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, created by that act. Act Febr. 9, 1893 (27 St. at L. 436 c 74 § 9).

[b] Appeal not a proceeding in equity.—(1) An appeal to the court of appeals in an interference case is not a proceeding in equity, and the provisions of U. S. Rev. St. § 4915, providing for relief by a bill in equity where the patent has been finally refused, do not apply. It is a proceeding at law, and hence a decision of the supreme court of the United States as to the statute referred to does not apply. Sobey v. Holsclaw, 28 App. (D. C.) 65 [certiorari den 203 U. S. 594 mem, 27 SCt 783 mem, constitutional, as being within the power of congress to enact.[60] The court of appeals has no original jurisdiction to direct and supervise the administration of the affairs of the patent office;[61] but merely the power to review its final decisions.[62] The statute also provides that by such appeal applicant for a patent waives his right to proceed in equity for the refusal of a patent.[63]

Supreme court. No appeal lies to the supreme court from the court of appeals in a case brought up from the patent office.[64]

[§ 225] b. Right of Appeal—(1) On Rejection of Application—(a) In General. Under the statute and rules providing for appeals from the board of appeals to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia,[65] as well as under prior provisions for appeals from the commissioner of patents,[66] an unsuccessful applicant for a patent, or for the reissue of a patent,[67] may appeal from an adverse final decision of the patent office.[68] One who has accepted a patent allowed him has no grounds for appeal;[69] and one who induces the amendment of a decision is estopped to question its validity.[70]

Distinctions. The rights of appeal in the case of the refusal of a patent upon the ground of nonpatentability of the claim, and refusal of a patent because of interference with a prior right of invention, are distinct rights, and the latter does not involve the former.[71]

[§ 226] (b) Decisions Appealable or Reviewable. A final decision within the meaning of the above rule[72] is determinable by its substance and effect, rather than its form,[73] and accordingly an applicant for a patent, or for a reissue thereof, may appeal from, and only from, any decision or action by the patent office tribunals that amounts to a final rejection of the application, as requested,[74] such as from the rejection of his application upon his refusal to take a limited patent,[75] or from the requirement that his application be divided.[76]

[§ 227] (c) Decisions Not Appealable or Reviewable. Mere interlocutory or preliminary rulings or orders on matters within the discretionary powers of the patent office tribunals are generally not the subject of review on appeal,[77] unless it appears that there has been a clear abuse of discretion and that substantial rights have been thereby affected or denied.[78] Thus, in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion, the appellate court will not review a decision holding an application abandoned,[79] or refusing to

In re Mattulath, 37 App. (D. C.) 410.

[d] In Canada, under the Patents Act (Rev. St. [1906] c 69 § 20), no provision is made for an appeal in case of conflicting applications for a patent; but under § 23(a) of the "Exchequer Court Act," that court may assume jurisdiction in such cases, and under § 82 of that act an appeal may be taken from its decision to the supreme court of Canada. reinstate an abandoned application for a patent,[80] or refusing a rehearing,[81] or refusing an application for leave to amend the claims of an original patent, on reissue.[82]

The reasons for a decision are not reviewable, but only the decision itself.[83]

[§ 228] (2) In Interference Cases[84]—(a) In General. Under acts of congress a party to an interference proceeding who is dissatisfied with the final decision therein may appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia;[85] and the jurisdiction of the court of appeals in such cases depends solely upon the statute,[86] and is not defeated by the possibility that the party entitled to priority might not be entitled to a patent.[87]

Patentee. There was a conflict of authority under the prior statutes as to whether a patentee could appeal from an adverse decision in interference proceedings.[88] The present statute, however, provides that "any party to an interference" may appeal,[89] and this would include a patentee as well as an applicant.

[§ 229] (b) Decisions Appealable or Reviewable. Since the only ultimate issue to be decided in an interference proceeding is that of priority of invention,[90] an appeal, in such cases, lies only from a final decision of priority in favor of one of the parties.[91] Mere interlocutory or preliminary orders or rulings on matters within the discretionary powers of the patent office tribunals and which have no reference to the merits of the cause, are not subject to review by the court of appeals,[92] except possibly in the case of a palpable abuse of discretion in making the order or ruling,[93] and except where, in extreme cases, it is necessary for the maintenance of the jurisdiction of the appellate court.[94]

Where the interference is between several parties, an award of priority to one is a final judgment in his favor as against all the others, from which each of the unsuccessful parties may appeal.[95] If one of

[a] Under prior statutes.—(1) Under the acts of 1836 and 1839, and, in fact, until 1870, an appeal could be taken, where the proper conditions existed, from the decision of the commissioner in an interference case to the court having jurisdiction of appeals from the commissioner's decisions. [a] Decision after reopening.—Where, after a decision in an inter-

them fails to appeal, his claims which were involved in the interference stand finally rejected and he can have no standing in the court of appeals on an appeal by one of the other parties.[96]

Ruling on motion to dissolve. A motion to dissolve an interference in the patent office before the final hearing of the question of priority, and before the case is ready for such hearing, is not appealable to the court of appeals unless made so by statute or rule of court;[97] and therefore, as a general rule, a decision dissolving an interference is not appealable to, or reviewable by, the appellate court,[98] unless, upon the request of the petitioners, the order is extended to a formal order of priority,[99] or unless the order dissolving the interference is in effect a judgment of priority;[1] and where a dissolving decision has been made, it cannot be changed into an order awarding priority, in order to permit an appeal.[2] But it has been held that if the motion to dissolve is denied, the soundness of this ruling may be considered on an appeal from the final award of priority as ancillary to the final judgment of priority.[3]

[§ 230] c. Proceedings Requisite To Appeal. The procedure by which such appeals may be perfected is purely statutory, and must be strictly followed.[4] Under the controlling statutory provisions,[5] rules of the patent office,[6] and rules of the court of appeals,[7] where an appeal is taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, appellant must give notice thereof to the commissioner, and must file in the patent office his reasons of appeal, specifically set forth in writing,[8] and must file in the court of appeals a certified copy of all the original papers and evidence in the case;[9] and the commissioner must furnish the court with a statement in writing of the grounds for his decision touching the points involved in the reasons of appeal.[10] The transcript of the reasons, however, should not be encumbered with unnecessary recitals.[11] The fact that a party has overlooked a rule of court relating to the perfecting of such appeals does not afford ground for excusing his delinquency;[12] but if he has done something, although imperfectly, toward perfecting his appeal, relief may possibly be granted him.[13]

The "reasons of appeal" are in the nature of the ordinary assignments of error in actions at law or in equity.[14] They must be specific, and must involve a point or points material to and affecting the decision of the patent office;[15] but they may be amended so as to make them more specific, or to remedy some inadvertence in their preparation, if the amendment is made in due time and no injury is done the opposing party.[16]

Amendment of claim before appeal. Where a claim for a patent is broader than the invention, the claim should be restricted by an amendment within proper limits before an appeal is taken from the decision of the patent office.[17] ference case between several parties awarding priority to one party and after the time for appeal therefrom has expired, the interference is reopened and priority awarded to another party, the effect of the last decision is to set aside the first, and is therefore a final decision adjudicating the rights of all of the parties, from which each of the other parties has the right of appeal. 99. Cosper v. Gold, 34 App. (D. C.) 194, 198.

1. Vincent v. Landsiedel, 48 App. (D. C.) 427.

[a] Thus, where in an interference the question of priority was before the commissioner of patents on appeal, and the junior party moved to dissolve on the ground that his adversary could not make the claims, and the commissioner sustained the motion without passing directly on the question of priority, the decision was in effect, although not in form, a judgment of priority which the court had jurisdiction to review, and a motion to dismiss the appeal was denied. Vincent v. Landsiedel, 48 App. (D. C.) 427.

2. Carlin v. Goldberg, 45 App. (D. C.) 540.

[a] Thus, where in an interference, before any trial, the commissioner granted a motion to dissolve the interference on the ground of the inoperativeness of the device disclosed by one of the parties, but, on the motion of that party, and in order to permit an appeal, changed his order into one awarding priority to the other party, an appeal from such order should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in the commissioner to make it. Carlin v. Goldberg, 45 App. (D. C.) 540.

[§ 231] d. Time for Taking and Perfecting Appeal. The notice of appeal to the court of appeals must be given to the commissioner, and the reasons of appeal filed in the patent office, within forty days from the date of the decision appealed from,[18] exclusive of Sundays and holidays, but including Saturday half holidays;[19] and appellant may avail himself of all the time allowed for taking and perfecting his appeal.[20] The time so prescribed must be computed from the date of the ruling or order, excluding the day of the date,[21] and not from the date of the notice sent to the party against whom the order is made, or his attorney.[22] But the petition for an appeal and the transcript of the record must be filed within forty days from the day upon which notice of appeal is given to the commissioner, unless such time is extended for special and sufficient cause.[23]

Extension of time. There has been a question as to whether the commissioner has power to extend the time for filing a transcript of the record beyond the time allowed by the rules of court;[24] and if the power exists at all, it cannot be exercised upon an application filed after the expiration of the prescribed time.[25]

Failure to file in time. Where the transcript of the record is not filed within the time allowed, it is the commissioner's duty to grant a motion by appellee to take further proceedings necessary to dispose of his case, "as though no notice of appeal had ever been given."[26]

[§ 232] e. Hearing and Review—(1) In General. The rules regulating the practice on the hearing and review of appeals generally[27] are applicable to appeals from the patent office with, of course, such modifications and variations as the patent laws provide or the nature of the particular case requires.[28] Under the statutes and rules, the court of appeals appoints the time and place for the hearing, and gives notice thereof to the commissioner, who in turn transmits such notice to all parties appearing to be interested therein;[29] and at the appointed time, the court hears and determines the appeal in a summary way,[30] and in doing so is limited to the papers and evidence produced in the patent office.[31] The court of appeals is bound by the rules lawfully established for the taking of testimony in such cases,[32] and cannot discredit witnesses whose credibility is in no way impeached and whose testimony is reasonable and free from suspicion.[33] Where the case is a very clear one, the appellate court may affirm a decision of the patent office on motion and in advance of the hearing on the printed record.[34]

Attendance of officers. An officer of the patent office may attend the hearing not as counsel or advocate for either party but to advise the court, and explain the decision appealed from.[35]

Nonappearance of appellant when the case is called for argument, and failure to file a brief in his behalf, is ground for affirming the decision of the patent office.[36]

Dismissal. Under the statute an appeal by a party to an interference must be dismissed if an adverse party files notice with the commissioner that he elects to proceed under the statute relating to a bill in equity to obtain a patent.[37]

appeals said to call his attention to the necessity for amending his specification in order that it might include only what is patentable, if no amendment of the claim or specification is asked for, the court, on appeal from the commissioner's decision, will refuse relief. Remedy in equity on refusal of patent see infra §§ 243–252

38. Decisions reviewable see supra §§ 226, 227.

On such appeal the appellate court is limited in its revision to the points involved in the reasons of appeal.[39] It has no power to consider points or objections which were not properly raised and reserved in the patent office,[40] or which are not included in the notice and reasons of appeal.[41] A ruling of the patent office from which no appeal is taken cannot be disregarded on an appeal from another ruling in the case.[42]

[§ 234] (b) In Interference Proceedings. The jurisdiction of the court of appeals on appeal from a decision in an interference proceeding is limited to the determination of priority,[43] and it need not decide whether either party shall receive a patent.[44] In passing on the issue of priority the court will consider only objections and questions that were properly raised and reserved in the patent office and included in the reasons of appeal,[45] unless the question or objection is a jurisdictional one.[46]

Particular objections or questions. Unless the ruling thereon is clearly erroneous, the appellate court will not consider or disturb the rulings of the patent office on the question of the operativeness of the device;[47] or the question of the patentability of the invention;[48] or whether the statutory bar of public use exists.[49]

Right to make claim. A decision sustaining a party's right to make a claim, in interference, is not appealable;[50] but where an interference is declared, the right of either party to make the claims of the issue may be considered, on appeal, as an ancillary question,[51] provided he filed, in the patent office, a motion to dissolve or showed good reasons why he failed to do so.[52]

Identity of invention. The question of identity of the invention ordinarily will not be reviewed by the appellate court,[53] except in extreme cases,[54] where such question was raised in the patent office by a motion to dissolve the interference.[55]

[§ 235] f. Determination and Disposition of Case—(1) In General. It is the duty of the appellate court to determine the merits of an appeal from a decision of the patent office;[56] and in a proper case it may tax the costs against one of the parties.[57] It should not disturb decisions, within the discretionary powers of the patent office, on questions of fact,[58]

except where palpable error has been committed.[59] But nevertheless the court is not bound by the conclusions drawn from such facts, unless convinced that such conclusions are correct;[60] and if it is apparent that the patent office tribunals are not in harmony upon controlling questions involved, or if the court is satisfied that an incorrect conclusion has been reached, it may consider the case afresh.[61] Where the facts on a particular issue are admitted, the question becomes one of law, and is not governed by the same rule applicable to cases where it is sought to review the exercise of discretion on the part of the patent office.[62]

Erroneous opinion. If the decision of the patent office is correct, the fact that its opinion is erroneous is immaterial.[63]

One claim covering invention. Where one claim out of a number erroneously rejected by the patent office completely covers applicant's invention, the rejection of the other claims will be affirmed to avoid inviting controversy and litigation.[64]

Former decision adhered to. A decision by the court in a former proceeding, based upon a party's own conduct, will be adhered to by the court in a subsequent proceeding involving the same application and the same exhibit and reduction to practice, although the testimony is somewhat different.[65] But the contention in an interference proceeding that the decision in an earlier proceeding was res judicata came too late, when not made in the patent office but first made in the court of appeals.[66]

[§ 236] (2) Concurrent Decisions. Concurrent decisions of the patent office tribunals on questions of fact in interference proceedings are entitled to very great weight and respect in the appellate court,[67] and carry a very strong presumption of their correctness;[68] but, if material error is made to appear, it is the duty of the court to correct it, and enter judgment accordingly.[69] Accordingly the court of appeals will affirm and not disturb decisions, concurred in by all the tribunals of the patent office, on questions of fact,[70] such as awarding priority of invention to one of the parties,[71] unless it is clearly and affirmatively made to appear that the decision was the result of material error,[72] the burden of making such showing being heavily upon appellant.[73] This rule is especially applicable where the case presented involves subject matter of a complicated and highly technical nature, upon which the experts of the patent office are less likely to err than the court.[74] It has been held that such a decision will not be reversed on any mere question of doubt, whether it be correct or not;[75] but that a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt that it is erroneous is necessary to justify a reversal;[76] and where the court is so convinced that error has occurred, it is its duty to reverse the decision.[77]

Rule not applicable. The rule, however, that the court will hesitate to disturb concurrent decisions of the patent office does not apply, where the different tribunals do not agree on the facts, or the conclusions to be drawn therefrom, although all award priority to the same party.[78]

[§ 237] g. Decision and Return of Proceedings. A decision by the court of appeals in an interference proceeding is not necessarily conclusive as to claims of the respective parties which were not put in issue,[79] but is conclusive upon every question which was or might have been presented and determined therein.[80]

Remanding case. In a proper case the appellate court may remand the case to the patent office for further proceedings in accordance with its decision,[81] but it has no power to send the case back to take further proofs.[82]

Return of proceedings. After hearing the case the court is required to return to the commissioner a certificate of its proceedings and decision, and the further proceedings in the case are governed thereby.[83]

[§ 238] 13. Caveats.[84] The practice of filing a caveat no longer prevails in this country, the statute providing therefor having been repealed.[85] Under the statute as it existed before repeal,[86] any person, who made a new invention or discovery, in order to protect himself and prevent a patent from being issued for the same device to another person until the caveator had an opportunity to complete and establish his priority of invention, could file in the patent office a caveat describing his invention and praying protection until it could be matured.[87] Such caveat

85. Act June 5, 1910 c 414 § 1 (repealing U. S. Rev. St. 4902, as amended by Act of March 3, 1903, 32 St. at L. 1227 c 1019 § 4).

[a] In England (1) a caveat is simply opposition at any stage to the grant of a patent to another. In re Johnson, 13 Ch. D. 398 note; In re Somerset, 13 Ch. D. 397. (2) It entitles the caveator to notice. Reg. v. Cutler, 14 Q. B. 372 note, 68 ECL 373, 117 Reprint 147, 1 Starke 354, 2 ECL 138, 171 Reprint 495; Matter of Fawcett, 2 De G. M. & G. 439, 51 Eng Ch 344, 42 Reprint 942.

86. U. S. Rev. St. § 4002, as amended by Act of March 3, 1903 (32 St. at L. 1227 c 1019) § 4.

was usually, but not necessarily, the record of an incomplete invention,[88] and entitled the one filing it to notice from the patent office if anyone filed an application for the same thing within the life of the caveat which was one year;[89] but it did not entitle him to notice of applications filed previously or subsequently,[90] and did not operate as a substitute for diligence in reducing the invention to practice.[91]

[§ 239] 14. Secrecy of Application. A rule of the patent office that pending applications for patents are preserved in secrecy by the patent office[92] is binding in the patent office,[93] but is not applicable to the investigation of causes by the courts;[94] and it has been held that this "rule of secrecy" is unwarranted and invalid as being inconsistent with the statutory provision[95] which permits any person to apply for and obtain copies of any of the records, papers, etc., of the patent office.[96]

[§ 240] 15. Right To Inspect and Obtain Copies of Records. Under the statutes and rules of the patent office the records, models, etc., of the patent office pertaining to patents granted may be inspected by a prospective applicant for a patent, or by his attorney;[97] and anyone making a proper application therefor and paying the fees provided by law may obtain certified copies of all public records of the patent office;[98] but he cannot obtain copies of pending applications to which he is not a party except upon a proper showing made to the commissioner of the right to, and necessity for, the copies or upon the order of a competent court.[99]

[§ 241] 16. Copies of Records as Evidence. Certified copies of records, books, papers, or drawings belonging to the patent office are received as evidence in all cases where the originals could be evidence,[1] in proof of facts pertinent to the issues in a case,[2] and certified copies of the specifications and drawings of foreign letters patent in the United States patent office constitute prima facie evidence of the fact of the granting of such letters patent and of the date and contents thereof.[3]

Of assignments. Although, under earlier statutes which required the assignment of a patent to be recorded in the patent office, a certified copy of such record could be received in evidence in place of the original instrument,[4] under the later statute, which leaves the recording of the assignment optional to the assignee,[5] such a certified copy, if standing alone and seasonably and properly objected to, is not admissible as primary evidence of the assignment,[6] and is admissible to prove title to a patent only where the proper foundation therefor is laid by showing the existence of the original instrument and that it is lost or destroyed,[7] or that it is out of complainant's power to produce it.[8]

[§ 242] 17. Rules of Patent Office as Law. Rules of practice established, under statutory authority by the commissioner of patents, with the approval of the secretary of the interior, for the conduct of proceedings in the patent office,[9] when not inconsistent with the statutes relating to the patent system, have the force and effect of law in all matters to which they relate,[10] and are binding upon the commissioner as well as upon applicants for patents,[11] and are not to be declared invalid upon any strained or doubtful construction.[12] Such a rule can be repealed, modified, or suspended by the commissioner only with the approval of the secretary of the interior.[13]

[§ 243] E. Remedy in Equity for Refusal of Patent—1. In General. By act of congress, as recently amended, whenever an application for a patent is refused by the commissioner of patents, applicant may maintain a bill in equity to obtain the patent,[14] unless an appeal has been taken from the decision of the board of appeals to the court of appeals and is pending or has been decided, in which case no action may be brought under this statute.[15] Under another provision, in case of an interference, an adverse party to such proceedings, after a decision by the board of appeals and notice of appeal to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, may elect to have further proceedings conducted by a suit in equity, whereupon appellant must file, within thirty days, a bill in equity.[16] The purpose of such suit in equity is to establish complainant's right to a patent which has been refused by the patent office,[17] and the remedy applies only where an application for a patent is rejected on the ground that the applicant is not, on the merits, entitled to it;[18] it is not available before the commissioner has made his decision.[19] Where there is no interfering claimant, a copy of the bill must be served upon the commissioner of patents, and in such case all costs and expenses of the proceedings must be paid by complainant whether the decision is in his favor or not.[20] Where there is an opposing party, the court will not make an order for substituted service on a defendant, but will leave complainant to give such "notice to adverse parties" as he deems sufficient.[21]

Necessity of resorting to mandamus.[22] Where the commissioner has refused to act on new claims presented by an applicant defeated in interference proceedings, on the ground of want of jurisdiction, applicant is not required to resort to mandamus to compel his action as a condition precedent to the bringing of a suit in equity under the statute.[23]

[§ 244] 2. Nature of, and Rules Governing, Proceeding. The proceeding in equity under this statute is not an appeal, but an original independent proceeding,[24] although it has been said that it is substantially an appeal in that the object of the bill is to secure a different result from that obtained in the patent office,[25] and that the proceeding is necessarily a part of the application for a patent.[26] It is a plenary suit in equity, to which all the rules of practice in such suits apply,[27] a proceeding in a court of the United States having original equity jurisdiction under the patent laws.[28]

In rem. A suit to establish right to a patent granted another is not strictly speaking one in rem.[29]

[§ 245] 3. Time of Suit. The suit must be brought within six months after the patent is refused.[30]

[§ 246] 4. Jurisdiction and Venue.[31] The federal district courts in the various districts have jurisdiction of bills in equity to obtain patents which have been refused by the commissioner.[32] The fact that, pending suit between two applicants, their interests become united does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to proceed to a decree adjudging the prior inventor's right to a patent.[33]

Venue. The suit must be brought in the district in which defendant is a resident,[34] or in which valid service can be had on him,[35] or in which he voluntarily appears;[36] and as the commissioner of patents is a resident of the District of Columbia the suit must be brought there against him where there is no interfering party,[37] unless, by accepting service, he consents to be sued in another district.[38]

[§ 247] 5. Parties.[39] Such suit may be maintained against another applicant to whom the patent has been awarded;[40] and in such a case the commissioner of patents is not a necessary party.[41] But the commissioner is a necessary party to such a suit where there is no opposing party.[42]

Assignor and assignee.[43] Where an applicant for a patent transfers his rights, a suit in equity, under the statute, to obtain a patent may be brought by the assignee in his own name;[44] and in such a case, the assignor alone cannot sue,[45] unless the assignment agreement gives him the right to do so.[46] The assignor of a patent, however, is a proper party to a suit to determine the right of an adverse applicant to the patent;[47] and where the suit is against the assignor, the assignee is a necessary party defendant.[48]

Government officers, applying for a patent, although having no monetary interest in the patent, if granted, are real parties in interest, and as such may maintain a suit in equity in aid of their application.[49]

[§ 248] 6. Requisites of Bill. The general rules apply as to the form and sufficiency of the bill,[50] in accordance with which it should be definite and certain and contain all the averments requisite for the maintenance of the suit,[51] and must name a defendant.[52]

[§ 249] 7. Issues and Proof. The question for the court to consider and decide in such a suit is whether applicant was entitled to a patent as prayed for,[53] and this generally depends upon the determination of the question of priority of invention as between the parties to the suit,[54] and also upon the

41. Graham v. Teter, 25 Fed. 555.

[a] Multifariousness.—A bill filed against an adverse party to obtain the issuance of a patent and which also joins the commissioner of patents as a defendant to compel the granting of a reissue, which is an ex parte matter, is multifarious. Gold v. Gold, 181 Fed. 544.

[a] Illustration.—An assignee, under an assignment made after the rejection by the commissioner of the assignor's application for a patent and after an appeal, may file a bill in his own name against the party to whom the patent was issued when the assignor's application was rejected, in order to have the patent issue to defendant declared void and to have one granted to him as assignee. [a] Thus, where an assignee of an invention has filed his bill to compel the issuance of a patent to him, the court may thereafter in its discretion authorize the original inventor to be joined as a party plaintiff without affecting the right to maintain the suit, although the suit could not be maintained under those circumstances if the inventor was a necessary party to the original bill. Becker v. General Chain Co., 273 Fed. 419.

[b] Suit against assignor.—A suit may be maintained against another applicant to whom the patent was awarded, although he has assigned his rights under the application. Thoma v. Perri, 205 Fed. 632 [aff 228 Fed. 904, 143 CCA 302].

[a] Bill held sufficient in general.—Prindle v. Brown, 155 Fed. 531, 84 CCA 45 [rev 136 Fed. 616].

[b] As to date of invention.—A bill which states the date of an application for a patent is not to be held to state that the invention was then first completed or reduced to practice unless nothing is alleged showing invention prior thereto, and a further allegation that the invention was made prior to such date covers the fact of reduction to practice, and is sufficient to carry the date back of the application. Prindle v. Brown, 155 Fed. 531, 84 CCA 45.

[c] As to priority of invention.—A bill praying for a decree declaring that a patent is void, and that plaintiff is entitled to a patent for his invention, should aver that plaintiff had so reduced his invention to practice or carried his idea into practical operation; and the bill cannot be sustained upon an averment that plaintiff had invented what had been previously patented to defendant, and had made drawings of the invention. Ellithorp v. Robertson, 8 F. Cas. No. 4,408, 4 Blatchf. 307, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 83.

[d] As to perjury and fraud.—To have the court of equity authorize the commissioner of patents to issue a patent to an unsuccessful applicant in interference proceedings and to enjoin the successful applicant from receiving or using letters patent for the invention, upon the ground that the commissioner was induced by defendant to decide priority of invention in his favor by means of false testimony and misleading statements, the bill must particularize or specify the perjury or falsity relied upon; to allege generally that there were false swearing, false representations, and misleading statements is not sufficient. Illingworth v. Atha, 42 Fed. 141.

[e] As to excuse for abandonment.—Where a bill in equity is brought for the grant of a patent which had been abandoned by failure to prosecute the application within the time limited, it must be alleged that the delay was unavoidable. Gandy v. Marble, 122 U. S. 432, 7 SCt 1290, 30 L. ed. 1223.

[b] Abandonment of application by failure to prosecute.—If applicant has abandoned his right by failure to prosecute his application within the time limited by law, the court will pass upon the question, and, if the delay is not shown to have been unavoidable, will not adjudge that applicant is by law entitled to receive a patent. Gandy v. Marble, 122 U. S. 432, 7 SCt 1290, 30 L. ed. 1223.

question of patentability of the invention.[55] It has been held that the court may direct the issuance of a patent on claims presented to the court, which are germane to the subject matter, although not included in the application as filed.[56]

Proof. Such a suit is subject to the ordinary equity rule that the evidence must be relevant to the issues made by pleadings,[57] which in such case relate only to complainant's right to a patent;[58] and for this purpose new evidence, other than that introduced in the patent office, may be presented,[59] except that complainant is estopped to offer evidence to overcome the decision of the patent office tribunals, which was wholly within his possession and control at the time of an interference proceeding, but which he withheld in that proceeding.[60] Complainant is not entitled to introduce proof to defeat defendant's right, as well as his own, by showing that neither party was entitled to a patent.[61]

[§ 250] 8. Evidence. The general rules apply as to the evidence[62] and witnesses.[63]

Burden of proof. The burden of proof is upon complainant to prove his right to a patent,[64] and where a patent has been issued to another, he must prove priority of invention on his part.[65] Even though defendant has defaulted, complainant is not entitled to a decree adjudging his right to a patent as a matter of course but must establish such right.[66]

Admissibility. Plaintiff may show by the patent office proceedings that a judgment of priority has been entered against him for the purpose of showing his right to maintain a bill under the statute;[67] and under the terms of the statute, in a suit in which there are adverse parties, the record in the patent office shall be admitted in whole or in part, on the motion of either party, subject to such terms and conditions as to costs, expenses, and the further cross-examination of the witnesses as the court may impose; and the testimony and exhibits or parts thereof of such record, when admitted, shall have the same force and effect as if originally taken and produced in the suit.[68]

[§ 251] 9. Effect and Weight of Decision of Patent Office.[69] A decision of the patent office refusing an application for a patent or awarding priority of invention and the issuance of a patent to the opposing party in interference[70] is not res judicata in a suit in equity by the unsuccessful party.[71] Such a decision, however, is presumptively correct and of great weight, and, in the absence of evidence showing it to be clearly erroneous, will be followed in such suit,[72] especially where, under the former practice, such decision was concurred in or granted by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia.[73]

[a] Where the commissioner has left priority to be determined, this question is the material one in a suit in equity brought by complainant to have his adversary's patent declared void. Sawyer v. Massey, 25 Fed. 144.

[b] Whether a party not involved in the suit was the first inventor is not the issue. Christie v. Seybold, 55 Fed. 69, 5 CCA 33.

[a] Thus, where the patent office denied a patent to an applicant, and its decision was affirmed by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, in a suit, under Rev. St. § 4915, the circuit court of appeals will not render judgment requiring the commissioner of patents to issue a patent

In order to overcome such decision and warrant the granting of relief to the unsuccessful applicant, there must be clear and convincing evidence that the decision was erroneous.[74]

[§ 252] 10. Adjudication; Appeal. The court is limited to an adjudication, in such a suit, as to whether the unsuccessful applicant is or is not entitled to a patent for his invention;[75] it may construe the claims in issue,[76] but has no power to alter them.[77] An affirmative adjudication in favor of an applicant authorizes the commissioner to issue such a patent on applicant's filing, in the patent office, a copy of the adjudication and otherwise complying with the requirements of the law.[78]

Notice before decree. Where defendant, in an inter partes suit, has entered an appearance, although in default for want of pleading, he is entitled to notice before a final decree is entered.[79]

Injunction.[80] The court has no power, under this statute, at the suit of the unsuccessful applicant, to enjoin the patent office from issuing a patent in favor of the one whom it has adjudged entitled thereto,[81] unless it is clearly shown that irreparable injury will otherwise result to complainant.[82]

Appeal.[83] An appeal may be taken, in a proper case, from the decree in such a suit.[84] But the circuit court of appeals to which appeal has been taken from a dismissal, for want of jurisdiction, cannot render an advisory opinion as to whether there is any remedy under the statute for an unsuccessful applicant with no opponent but the commissioner;[85] nor is defendant, to whom a patent has been issued, entitled to urge for the first time on appeal that the patent should be a joint one.[86]

[§ 253] F. Patent Agents or Attorneys. By act of congress, the commissioner of patents, subject to the approval of the secretary of the interior, may prescribe rules and regulations governing the right and qualifications of a person to act as a patent agent or attorney before his office[87] and may, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, suspend or exclude from further practice an agent or attorney who has violated or refused to comply with such regulations.[88] The commissioner's hearing and determination of charges against a patent agent or attorney and the secretary's approval of the commissioner's findings are judicial functions;[89] but as congress has the right to vest the commissioner and the secretary with such judicial functions, it also has the power to authorize them to delegate such functions to an assistant,[90] and therefore the act of congress[91] which provides that the assistant secretary of the interior shall perform such duties in the department as shall be prescribed by the secretary is not limited to merely administrative duties, but authorizes the secretary to delegate to the assistant the judicial duty of approving the findings of the commissioner of patents in proceedings for the disbarment of a patent soliciwhere there is a diversity of opinion between its members as to whether the patent should issue, and there is no testimony materially changing the record before the court of appeals of the District of Columbia. Gold v. Newton, 254 Fed. 824, 166 CCA 270 [certiorari den 249 U. S. 608 mem, 39 SCt 290 mem, 63 L. ed. 799 mem].

[b] Judgment not conclusive.—(1) The court of appeals of the District of Columbia, in respect of its action in patent cases, is one of the tribunals of the patent office, and its decision is in no sense a final decree which cannot be collaterally attacked, but is subject to review as to all matters decided in a suit in equity under Rev. St. § 4915, although it will be followed, unless the contrary is established by convincing testimony. Clements v. Kirby, 274 Fed. 575. (2) A judgment of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia in an interference proceeding is not conclusive of patentability or priority, and the doctrines of res judicata and estoppel can have no application in a subsequent suit to have the patent adjudged invalid and void, but such judgment is admissible, and has evidential value, in the subsequent suit. Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., 290 Fed. 565 [aff 8 F. (2d) 41 (certiorari granted 269 U. S. 547 mem, 46 SCt 106 mem, 70 L. ed. 405 mem, and certiorari den 269 U. Peters Cartridge Co., 69 Fed. 408 [aff 77 Fed. 630, 23 CCA 367] (beyond reasonable doubt).

[a] Thus, where the question which of two applicants for a patent for the same invention was the true inventor depends on questions of fact, the court, in an action brought, under Rev. St. § 4915, by the unsuccessful applicant to compel an issuance of the patent to him, must be very clearly satisfied that the decision of the patent office tribunals between the two was erroneous before it will be justified in reversing the same. Gillette v. Sendelbach, 146 Fed. 758, 77 CCA 55.

[b] Testimony given long after experiment with a device for which a patent was claimed, and after litigation had been consummated in patent office tribunals, is entitled to little weight. Muther v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 7 F. (2d) 954 [aff 14 F. (2d) 808].

[c] Evidence held sufficient.—(1) In general. James Heddon's Sons v. Rush, 271 Fed. 689. (2) Decisions of the patent office and the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, after a hearing in interference between the same parties, adjudging priority of invention to defendant, are presumptively correct only, and that presumption is destroyed by proof that they were based on false and perjured evidence. [a] Appellate procedure.—Where, under Rev. St. § 4915, the circuit court decreed that plaintiff was entitled to a patent for certain claims, the decision resting solely on the fact of his being the prior inventor, the appellate court must consider the question of patentability, and, if it finds there was no patentability in the claims as to which plaintiff was declared to be entitled to a patent, the decree will be reversed and the bill dismissed. Revocation. Under a rule of the patent office, the powers of a patent attorney may be revoked at any stage in the proceedings upon application to, and approval by, the commissioner; and when so revoked, the office will communicate directly with applicant or such other attorney as he may appoint, and the attorney whose powers are revoked will be promptly notified thereof.[93] The spirit of this rule requires that notice of such revocation should be given to the legal representatives of a deceased applicant.[94]

[§ 254] G. Conclusiveness and Effect of Patent Office Decisions*[95]—1. Upon Proceedings in Patent Office—a. In General. The commissioner of patents is bound by the decision of a predecessor, except in case of fraud, clerical error apparent upon the face of the proceedings, or newly discovered evidence presented within a reasonable time and such as would be sufficient cause for granting a new trial in a court of law.[96] Accordingly, the commissioner of patents is bound by the decision of his predecessor in granting,[97] refusing,[98] or in antedating[99] a patent, so long as such decision is unreversed by a competent court.[1] The decision of an assistant commissioner is of the same authority as that of the commissioner.[2] The commissioner, however, is not bound to issue a patent upon the decision of an examiner[3] or the board of examiners-in-chief.[4]

Final rejection of an application by the patent office will authorize its rejection of another application by the same party upon the same subject matter.[5]

In an interference, the grant of a patent is prima facie evidence that the patentee is the inventor[6]—the first inventor; the burden of proof is upon the contestant, and every reasonable doubt should be resolved against him.[7]

A patentee is bound by the terms of his patent.[8]

[§ 255] b. Decision in Interference.[9] A decision in an interference is res judicata upon a subsequent application by the defeated party or his assign,[10] or in a subsequent interference between the same parties or their assigns,[11] as to every issue which was or might have been decided. Such decision is not res judicata upon a question that was not in issue.[12] A losing party in an interference, however,

[a] Division of claims.—The action of the examiner who required a division of claims will not foreclose the commissioner from rejecting an application upon the ground that the claims involved only a single inventive idea, covered by the patent issued. In re Woodsome, 56 App. (D. C.) 138, 10 F. (2d) 1003.

may proceed in equity[13] where the decision in the former proceeding is not res judicata.[14] Nor is a defeated party in an interference estopped from contesting the validity of the patent, if sued for its infringement.[15]

Conclusiveness upon patent office. Since the question decided in an interference is that of priority,[16] to which the right of a party to make a claim has been held to be ancillary,[17] the commissioner is without authority to direct a primary examiner to read-judicate, upon an ex parte application of a defeated party, the question whether or not he had a right to make his claims in the interference proceeding.[18] However, where the operativeness of a device, the claims of which were in interference, did not raise the question of the right to make the claims, but one of patentability, the dissolution of the interference upon such ground of inoperativeness, since it was not a determination of priority, will not prevent an examiner from redeclaring the interference upon applicant's ex parte prosecution of the application.[19]

As to question of priority. The effect of an order that a party in interference is not the prior inventor is to award priority to his opponent.[20] Where several interferences are consolidated and heard as one, an order that the senior party was not the prior inventor is an award of priority against him as to each of his opponents, but not a final decision of priority in favor of any of such opponents as against another.[21]

As to right to patent. An award of priority in interference does not necessarily entitle the party in whose favor it is made to a patent.[22]

Duress. A decision in an interference proceeding obtained by duress must be attacked in a direct proceeding and not collaterally.[23]

[§ 256] 2. Upon Proceedings in Court[24]—a. In General. Except as to compliance with statutory provisions regulating procedure in the patent office,[25] decisions of the patent office in granting or refusing a patent,[26] or in the construction of claims,[27] including the decisions of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia upon an appeal from the patent office,[28] are not conclusive upon the courts. Such decisions are, however, regarded as prima facie correct.[29] If a patent has been granted, it is prima

[a] Dictum.—The decision of the examiner of interferences in a prior interference that a party reduced his invention to practice by a certain date is not res judicata where, in that proceeding, such party had a constructive reduction to practice as of an earlier date and it was therefore unnecessary for the examiner to decide that he had actually reduced it to practice at a later date. facie valid.[30] The burden is upon one disputing a decision of the patent office to overcome it,[31] as the rule is variously stated, by clear and convincing proof,[32] by the clearest of evidence,[33] or by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt.[34] Every reasonable doubt is to be resolved in favor of the patent.[35] The presumption of the validity of a patent is strengthened by decisions of the patent office tribunals sustaining it.[36] A patent is entitled to the presumption of validity, although an unessential allegation in an affidavit supporting the application was false.[37]

There is no presumption in favor of the validity of a patent where the records of the patent office show conclusively that the commissioner has acted without authority,[38] or that the patent has been issued inadvertently.[39]

Collateral attack. A patent cannot be attacked collaterally for defects not apparent upon its face,[40] as where the patent is alleged to have been fraudulently obtained.[41]

Estoppel of patentee. Where an applicant accepts a claim narrower than that in his original application, such claim cannot afterward be construed to cover that which was rejected by the patent office.[42] But to be so estopped a patentee must have surrendered something, which he now claims, to obtain that which he was allowed.[43] Moreover, the rejection of claims in an application for an apparatus patent, although acquiesced in by applicant, does not invalidate a patent subsequently granted to him for the method of operation of such apparatus.[44]

Foreign patents and decrees. The presumption of validity of a patent from the successive grant of similar patents in various foreign countries is strengthened by decrees of the courts of foreign countries sustaining the patents in those countries.[45] But such presumption is rebutted by a decree of the United States court of another circuit, sustained by the circuit court of appeals, holding the patent void.[46]

State courts. A patent, it has been held, is conclusively valid in a state court.[47]

[§ 257] b. As to Application and Procedure in Obtaining Patent. In the absence of fraud, the grant of a patent is conclusive as to compliance with statutory requirements as to the procedure in the patent office,[48] for example, as to oaths,[49] notice,[50] or fees;[51] as to unavoidable delay in preparing the application for examination;[52] as to the filing, necessity, and sufficiency of drawings, models, and specimens of ingredients;[53] as to the appointment and authority of an attorney;[54] or as to the signatures upon the patent.[55] But a patent is void where the theory of the alleged invention and the mode of employing it are introduced for the first time in an amended specification that is unsworn to.[56]

[a] Patent invalid on its face.—The commissioner of patents is an officer of limited authority, whose jurisdiction is restricted to the particular cases mentioned in the statute; therefore, whenever it is apparent upon inspection of the patents that he has acted without authority, or has exceeded it, his judgment must necessarily be regarded as invalid. formal defects, its validity in general cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding.[57]

[§ 258] c. As to Patentability[58]—(1) In General. The decision of the patent office is not conclusive upon questions of patentability,[59] such as novelty,[60] utility,[61] invention,[62] prior public use or sale,[63] and abandonment.[64] The grant of a patent, however, is prima facie evidence of patentability.[65] The rejection of a patent is prima facie evidence that a device is not patentable.[66]

The burden of proof is upon those who question the validity of the patent.[67]

Separation of claims. The decision of the patent office is not conclusive upon the separation of claims for the purpose of filing divisional applications.[68]

Design. Where a patent has been granted for a design, it has been held to raise a strong legal presumption of patentability which the courts may not lightly disregard.[69]

[§ 259] (2) Novelty.[70] The decision of the patent office is not conclusive upon the question of novelty.[71] The grant of a patent, however, is prima facie evidence of novelty.[72] The burden is upon those who question the patent's novelty to rebut the presumption,[73] as the rule is variously stated, with reasonable clearness,[74] by clear[75] and convincing evidence,[76] or, if oral evidence is relied upon, by clear, satisfactory proof, beyond a reasonable doubt.[77] Thus every doubt is to be resolved in favor of the novelty of the patent,[78] especially where the commercial utility of the device is beyond dispute.[79] The decision of the commissioner of patents on the question of novelty, it has been said, is entitled to the highest respect.[80] If the patent office did not take the prior art into consideration[81] or did not cite pertinent references,[82] the presumption is weakened. But where the prior art[83] or prior research[84] was considered by the patent office, or where the application was sharply contested[85] and passed the scrutiny of the tribunals of the patent office,[86] the presumption of novelty carries weight. The original presumption of novelty arising from the grant of a patent is strengthened by its extension.[87]

Popular acclaim.[88] The grant of a patent and popular acclaim raises a presumption of novelty,[89] to be overcome only by clear proof.[90] However, where commercial success is attributable to the unique advertising of the article, the weight of this presumption may be discounted.[91]

[§ 260] (3) Anticipation.[92] In an action by a patentee, to which the defense is invalidity of the patent because of anticipation,[93] that the patent has been granted after other patents, supposed to show anticipation, were considered by the patent office, although not conclusive,[94] is prima facie evidence,[95] usually strong prima facie evidence,[96] of the validity of the patent, particularly as against the patents considered,[97] to be overcome only by clear proof.[98] Where the patent office failed to cite or consider pertinent references, the presumption of validity from the grant of the patent is weakened.[99] It has been held that, where controlling references have not been cited or considered, there is no presumption in favor of the patent.[1] There is a presumption, however, it has been held, that in determining the state of the prior art the officials of the patent office in granting a patent considered other patents than those cited in the file wrapper.[2] In general, doubt must be resolved in favor of the patent in suit.[3]

Infringement of prior patent. In an action against a patentee—or one using a device or combination similar to that of the patentee—because of infringement of an earlier patent,[4] the grant of the subsequent patent is not conclusive that there is no infringement of the prior patent.[5] However, it has been held, that a patent is prima facie evidence that the invention so patented is different from that of the prior patent[6] and does not infringe it.[7] Likewise, there is a presumption that a later patent does not infringe an earlier patent where the commissioner has decided that there was no interference between them;[8] and the grant of a patent by the patent office after withdrawing a reference to another patent creates a presumption of substantial difference to be considered in determining whether or not the earlier

"There is always a presumption of novelty arising from the patent itself, greater or less, according to circumstances. If the patent relates to something of temporary interest, and the object sought is of little importance, and offers but slight chance of profitable use, it may receive but little attention in the Patent Office, and the presumption therefore is slight; but where the problem sought to be solved by the patent is of such importance that the solution of it promises great pecuniary returns, and the testimony shows . . . that all the claims of the patent were subject to critical analysis by trained experts in that office . . . and the subject appears to have been thoroughly threshed out, the presumption in favor of novelty is greater than in those cases where the patent may have passed by inadvertence." patent has been infringed.[9] Thus the burden is upon one maintaining that a subsequent patent is an infringement to overcome the presumption in its favor.[10] On the other hand, it has been held that the prima facie evidence of patentable difference from the grant of the later patent is no evidence of noninfringement of the earlier patent.[11] Likewise, where the prior patentee has made a primary invention which accomplishes a result never before produced, the presumption that a later patent on the same subject is for a subordinate improvement of the primary invention and subject to an infringement of the earlier patent is as strong as the general presumptions of noninfringement.[12] Any presumption of noninfringement from the grant of a patent to an alleged infringer is of no avail where the article sold materially departs from his patent.[13]

Prior art.[14] Evidence of prior use, in order to avoid a patent, must be clear and convincing; every reasonable doubt is to be resolved against the contestant.[15] Where the evidence of anticipation in an infringement suit is not substantially different from that considered by the patent office, the presumption is that the patent is valid.[16] Where the most relevant prior art was considered and disregarded by the patent office, the presumption of validity, it has been held, is strengthened.[17] However, a patent issued without due consideration of the prior art is entitled to little, if any, presumption of validity.[18] Likewise, where the patent examiner failed to find a prior disclosure, discovery of which would have rendered a grant of the patent doubtful, there is no presumption of validity.[19] But doubt as to the prior disclosure of a patent should be resolved in favor of the patentee.[20]

Patentable difference between pending applications. The grant of a patent for an invention, while another application for an invention for the same purpose is pending,[21] or the grant of patents on two applications which are pending at the same time and relate to the same subject matter,[22] is prima facie evidence that there is a patentable difference between the two, and that the later does not infringe the prior patent.[23] Where patents have been issued, after close scrutiny by the patent office in an interference between the two applications, the decision of the patent office that one is not an infringement of the other is entitled to great consideration.[24] Likewise, that an alleged anticipating patent had been pending in the patent office at the same time as the patent in suit and that no interference had been declared between them is strong prima facie evidence of patentable novelty.[25]

[§ 261] (4) Utility.[26] The decision of the patent office is not conclusive upon the question of utility.[27] However, the grant of a patent is prima facie evidence of utility.[28] A contestant has the burden of rebutting this[29] by strong and clear evidence.[30] Every reasonable doubt, it has been held, is to be resolved in favor of the utility of a patent.[31] The grant of a patent, it has been held, is entitled to weight on the question of utility.[32] The presumption of utility upon the grant of a patent is greatly strengthened by the fact that one, claiming the uselessness of the patent, for many years represented it to be useful.[33] That no machine has been constructed or put into practical operation under a patent is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of its validity.[34] Likewise, that a device is susceptible of improvement, or that like inventions are so superior that they may supersede the use of it, will not negative the presumption of utility.[35] The original presumption of utility arising from the grant of a patent is strengthened by its extension.[36]

Ala.—Stephenson v. Allison, 123 Ala. 439, 26 S 290.

Oh.—Clark v. Bentel, 9 Oh. Dec.

Generic invention. The presumption of the utility and operativeness of a generic invention is stronger than that in the case of a simple or improvement patent.[37]

The decision of an examiner of interferences that a device is inoperative is of no effect in an infringement suit where the evidence before the examiner was not the same as that before the court, and where the question was not properly before him and the board of examiners-in-chief and the court of appeals of the District of Columbia so held.[38]

[§ 262] (5) Invention.[39] A decision of the patent office is not conclusive upon the question of invention.[40] However, the grant of a patent is prima facie evidence of invention;[41] and the burden of proof is upon one asserting that a device is without invention.[42] The presumption of invention is ordinarily given weight,[43] but may be outweighed by facts showing lack of invention,[44] such as manifest equivalency of function,[45] or that changes in old devices required only the skill of a mechanic,[46] or represent a mere mechanical advance.[47] Where the grant of a patent has been made upon consideration of the prior art, the presumption of invention carries weight,[48] and is strengthened in an infringement suit where the prior patents cited by defendant as anticipatory were considered by the patent office.[49] The result of interference proceedings, it has been held, has no weight upon the question of invention in a subsequent suit for infringement between the same parties.[50]

Combination.[51] The grant of a patent is prima facie evidence that a claim is a valid combination.[52]

Aggregation.[53] That a patent has been issued, after objection upon the ground of aggregation, although not conclusive,[54] is persuasive prima facie evidence of its validity.[55]

resolved in favor of the patentee as the first inventor.[72] But the presumption that the patentee is the first inventor may be overcome by facts within the judicial knowledge of the court.[73] Where the court of appeals of the District of Columbia has decided as to the first inventor, a contestant, it has been held, cannot succeed except upon new and convincing evidence.[74] The extension of a patent, resisted on the ground of want of novelty, strengthens the presumption that the patentee was the original inventor.[75]

Time to which presumption extends. The presumption that the patentee is the first and original inventor extends back only to the time of filing the original application.[76] In the absence of the application, the presumption extends back only to the date of the patent.[77]

[§ 266] (b) Priority.[78] The decisions of the patent office, including those of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, are not conclusive upon the question of priority, even as between the parties to the prior interference proceedings.[79] However, such decision is prima facie correct,[80] is entitled to weight,[81] and places upon one contesting it the burden of proving the contrary,[82] as the rule is variously stated, by clear and convincing evidence,[83] by the clearest of proof,[84] by evidence of the most convincing and satisfactory nature,[85] or evidence which in character and amount carries thorough conviction.[86] All doubts, it has been held, must be resolved

[a] Thus, while the decision of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, determining priority of invention between a patentee and a later applicant in favor of the latter, does not preclude a relitigation of the question on the merits as between the two patents, unless there is a material difference in the evidence, it should be accepted as the law of the patents involved. Rousso v. Barber, 299 Fed. 801 [aff 3 F. (2d) 740 (certiorari den 267 U. S. 596 mem, 45 SCt 352 mem, 69 L. ed. 805 mem)].

against the contestant of the decision.[87] If all the tribunals of the patent office have concurred in the decision, the presumption in favor of its correctness is especially strong.[88] Likewise, where the claim of an inventor has been subjected to close and careful scrutiny in the patent office and in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, under the stimulus of a heated contest, the presumption of priority arising from the grant of the patent has greatly increased weight.[89] Where the decision of the commissioner has been affirmed by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, it has been held that the question of priority will not be reopened, unless new evidence is adduced.[90] That an award of priority by the patent office was not based on an adjudication upon the merits, but on the failure of a party to take testimony in support of his claim of priority, tends to weaken the force of the award.[91] When the prima facie force of a patent as to priority of invention on the part of the patentee has been once destroyed by evidence of prior invention on the part of another, it cannot be restored by the patent itself, but only by specific testimony from witnesses.[92] A decision in interference proceedings as to the priority of invention is not a bar to an action to determine the ownership of the patent under a contract affecting all future inventions of the inventor.[93]

No presumption. If the decision of the patent office is based upon fraudulent evidence, there is no presumption of priority in favor of the successful party.[94] Nor is there a presumption of priority because of a decision in an interference proceeding where the patent held to be nonanticipating was itself anticipated by another patent not involved in the interference.[95]

Collateral attack. The decision of the patent office is not subject to collateral attack except for gross mistake or fraud.[96]

In a suit against one not a party nor in privity with parties to an interference proceeding, decisions of patent office officials, if admissible at all, are so only in support of independent evidence to establish prior invention.[97]

[§ 267] (2) Identity of Inventor. The decision of the patent office is presumptively correct as to the identity of the inventor.[98]

[§ 268] (3) Joint Inventors.[99] A joint patent is prima facie evidence that all patentees participated in the invention.[1]

[§ 269] (4) Assignees.[2] A patent is prima facie evidence that title is in the assignee named.[3]

VIII. REQUISITES AND VALIDITY OF LETTERS PATENT*

[§ 270] A. Form and Contents—1. In General. The statute requires that all patents be issued in the name of the United States of America, under the seal of the patent office, and shall either be signed by the commissioner of patents or have his name printed thereon and attested by an assistant commissioner of the patents or by one of the law examiners duly designated by the commissioner.[4] The statutes also provide that the patent shall contain a short title or description of the invention or discovery correctly indicating its nature and design, and a grant to the patentee, his heirs or assigns, for the statutory term, of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention or discovery throughout the United States, and the territories thereof, referring to the specification for the particulars thereof.[5] The title or description provided by the statute need not be more specific than necessary to indicate generally

*By GILBERT G. FINLEY (§§ 270–293).

the nature and design of the invention;[6] and the patent office frequently suggests its form.[7] As to its sufficiency some confusion arose in the early cases from failure to distinguish between the requirements of our statutes and the requirements of the English law.[8] The specifications must be searched for an exact description of what is covered;[9] a copy of the specification and drawings must be annexed to the patent and form a part thereof;[10] and the title or description ought not to be repugnant to the specifications.[11] It is not necessary for the patent to contain any recitals that the prerequisites to the grant of it have been duly complied with.[12]

[§ 271] 2. Name of Patentee.[13] While the statute provides that every patent shall contain a grant to "the patentee, his heirs or assigns,"[14] the words "the patentee, his heirs and assigns" mean "the patentee or his heirs or assigns."[15] They comprehend the legal representatives,[16] assigns in law,[17] and assigns in fact.[18] The "assignee" means the assignee in any degree and however remote,[19] and the patent may issue to the person who by the records of the office is assignee of the patent, although not technically the assignee of the inventor,[20] and although he has made an assignment to another,[21] and although he ceases to have any legal or equitable interest in the invention after executing the assignment.[22] The issuance of letters patent to the assignee of an applicant is prima facie evidence of title in the assignee named.[23]

Issuance in name of inventor after his death. The words "his heirs or assigns" raise no limitation in the sense of the strict common-law rule applied to realty,[24] and a patent issued to the inventor, "his heirs and assigns," is not void because of the death of the inventor before the patent was issued.[25]

Executor or administrator. While congress has provided that the right of applying for and obtaining a patent devolves upon the executor or administrator in trust for the inventor's heirs at law, in case he should have died intestate, or in trust for his devisees, if he shall have left a will,[26] letters patent issued to the personal representatives of a deceased inventor need not contain words creating a trust for such persons,[27] nor is it necessary that the beneficiaries should be named upon the face of the patent.[28] The patent office rules provide that in case of the death of the inventor during the time intervening between the filing of his application and the granting of a patent thereon, the letters patent will issue to the executor or administrator upon proper intervention by him.[29]

Partnership. Where a partnership has become the assignee of the inventor,[30] a patent may issue to it in its firm name,[31] although such name is wholly fanciful.[32]

Fraud. A patent fraudulently taken out in the name of another than the inventor is void.[33]

[§ 272] B. Date of Issue. The statute provides that every patent shall issue within three months from the date of payment of the final fee, which fee must be paid within six months from the date of allowance and notice to applicant or his agent.[34] This requirement has been held to be directory

[a] Prior to the act of 1793 the description contained in the application was required to be recited substantially in the patent. Evans v. Chambers, 8 F. Cas. No. 4,555, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 7, 2 Wash. C. C. 125.

[a] Amended patent.—Where a patent is refused and canceled because of error therein, and an amended patent issued, it dates from the amendment. Railway Register Mfg. Co. v. North Hudson County R. Co., 23 Fed. 593.

[b] In England (1) letters patent are valid when the seal is applied and before enrollment. Devonshire v. Neill, L. R. 2 Ir. 132, 146. (2) Renewed letters patent are not void because issued after the date of the expiration of the original letters patent. Russell v. Ledsam, 14 M. & W.

merely.[35] A patent cannot be antedated.[36] Where several patents are dated alike, there is a rebuttable presumption that the earlier in number is earlier in publication.[37] The date of issue and not the date of filing determines the priority of patents issued to the same inventor on the same invention.[38]

[§ 273] C. Record. All patents, together with the specifications, must be recorded in the patent office in books kept for that purpose.[39]

[§ 274] D. Clerical Errors.[40] Letters patent, regularly issued and valid on their face, will not be invalidated by a clerical error of the patent office.[41] Clerical errors in the name of the patentee will not render the patent void, provided there is sufficient evidence to identify him.[42]

[§ 275] E. Correction or Amendment of Patents. The officials of the government have the power to correct errors made by them in the issue of patents,[43] and errors made by applicant may be corrected by disclaimer or reissue.[44] The correction must be by the action of existing officers, not by former officers who have gone out of office.[45] The validity of an amendment shortening the term of a patent cannot be questioned, as against one who relied thereon, by a patentee who voluntarily procured it under a mistake as to the necessity thereof.[46]

[§ 276] F. Interfering Patents[47]—1. In General. Interfering patents are those which claim the same invention in whole or in part.[48]

[§ 277] 2. Validity. No more than one patent can legally be granted for the same invention.[49] If the second patent is to the same patentee, it is ipso facto void,[50] but if to a different patentee, it is not,[51] and the patentee may bring suit to determine who is the first inventor.[52] The statute extending the rights of priority for the filing of applications for patent for inventions patented abroad, but providing that the rights of citizens having rights under conflicting patents or applications shall not be affected,[53] does not validate an interfering patent issued prior to the other but subsequent to an application by the other patentee for a foreign one for the same invention, as it only licenses the patentee to make, use, and sell the invention.[54]

[§ 278] 3. Proceedings To Invalidate—a. In General. After interfering patents have been issued, the court, not the patent office, is the forum to determine priority of invention.[55] By force of express statutory provision,[56] any person interested in interfering patents, or in the working of the invention claimed under either of them, may have relief against the interfering patentee and all parties interested under him by suit in equity against the owners of the interfering patent, and the court may adjudge either patent invalid.[57] A party is not limited to this remedy, however; he may join it with an infringement suit,[58] or he may bring an action at law or in equity for infringement alone.[59] The proceeding contemplated by the statute is the ordinary adversary proceeding in chancery.[60] It is independent of any interference in the patent office,[61] is governed by ordinary equity rules,[62] and must be brought in the district where defendant may be found.[63] It is not necessary for defendant to file a cross bill to obtain affirmative relief,[64] but he has the right to do so.[65]

[§ 279] b. Issues. In this proceeding the issue of whether the patents are interfering patents is determined,[66] and, if this is shown, ordinarily the next question is who is the first inventor.[67] While the contrary has been held,[68] it is now well settled, in accord with the earliest decisions,[69] that the statute authorizes the court to declare, not only either, but both, of the patents void either in whole or in part,[70] and any ground of invalidity of complainant's patent may be put in issue.[71]

Defenses. If the bill fails to show that defendants are the owners of the alleged interfering patent, it is bad on special demurrer.[72] A sale pendente lite by a plaintiff of his interest in the patent operates as an abatement, but it is a matter of defense of which plaintiff cannot take advantage.[73]

56. U. S. Code tit 35 § 66.

57. See cases infra this note.

[a] Parties.—(1) it is required only that the persons instituting the proceedings shall be "interested" in any one of the patents. Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 69 Fed. 346. (2) Complainant's right is not affected by the fact that he has surrendered his patent for the purpose of procuring a reissue. Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, supra.

[b] Statute applies to cases where there is a claimed interference between patents granted to the same inventor. Keystone Trading Co. v. Zapota Mfg. Co., 210 Fed. 456.

[c] Patentability of an alleged specific improvement of a prior and basic patent is not the subject matter of an interference suit. International Signal Co. v. Vreeland Apparatus Co., 278 Fed. 468.

[d] Design of the statute was to give a speedy and complete remedy to the owners of interfering patents. Lockwood v. Cleaveland, 6 Fed. 721.

58. Kuhlke Mach. Co. v. Miller Rubber Co., 8 F. (2d) 614; Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., 227 Fed. 903; Western Electric Co. v. Sperry Electric Co., 59 Fed. 295, 8 CCA 129; American Roll-Paper Co. v. Knopp, 44 Fed. 609; Leach v. Chandler, 18 Fed. 262.

59. Eick v. Economic Mach. Co., 297 Fed. 835; Western Electric Co. v. Sperry Electric Co., 59 Fed. 295, 8 CCA 129.

Suit for infringement see infra §§ 521–656.

60. Liggett, etc., Tobacco Co. v. Miller, 1 Fed. 203, 1 McCrary 31.

61. Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73; Atkinson v. Boardman, 2 F. Cas. No. 607.

Interference in patent office see supra §§ 196–222.

62. Liggett, etc., Tobacco Co. v. Miller, 1 Fed. 203, 1 McCrary 31.

[a] Service of notice on parties outside the district cannot be made. Liggett, etc., Tobacco Co. v. Miller, 1 Fed. 203, 1 McCrary 31.

63. Liggett, etc., Tobacco Co. v. Miller, supra; Prentiss v. Elsworth, 19 F. Cas. No. 11,386.

64. Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602; American Clay-Bird Co. v. Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co., 31 Fed. 466; Lockwood v. Cleaveland, 6 Fed. 721.

[a] Affirmative relief may be obtained by an answer alleging the validity of his own patent and the invalidity of plaintiff's. Electric Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602.

[b] Dismissal of bill.—Plaintiff cannot dismiss where affirmative relief is prayed. Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602.

65. Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., 279 Fed. 758; Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602; American Clay-Bird Co. v. Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co., 31 Fed. 466.

[a] Counterclaim for infringement (1) of claims not involved in interference may be filed (Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., 279 Fed. 758), (2) even though plaintiff does not reside, or have a regular and established place of business, in the district (Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., supra), (3) and states in his complaint that he appears in court only for the purpose of the relief provided by U. S. Code tit 35 § 66 (Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., supra).

66. Kelly Well Co. v. Kirschke Concrete Well Co., 14 F. (2d) 274; International Signal Co. v. Vreeland Apparatus Co., 278 Fed. 468; Natural Food Co. v. Williams, 163 Fed. 252, 89 CCA 630; Simplex R. Appliance Co. v. Wands, 115 Fed. 517, 53 CCA 171; Stonemetz Printers' Mach. Co. v. Brown Folding-Mach. Co., 57 Fed. 601 [aff 58 Fed. 571, 7 CCA 374]; Dederick v. Fox, 56 Fed. 714; Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 49 Fed. 370; Pentlarge v. New York Bung, etc., Co., 20 Fed. 314; Morris v. Kempshall Mfg. Co., 20 Fed. 121; Gold, etc., Ore Separating Co. v. U. S. Disintegrating Ore Co., 10 F. Cas. No. 5,508, 6 Blatchf. 307, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 489.

[a] First question to be determined is whether the patents involved are interfering patents. Simplex R. Appliance Co. v. Wands, 115 Fed. 517, 53 CCA 171; Gold, etc., Ore Separating Co. v. U. S. Disintegrating Ore Co., 10 F. Cas. No. 5,508, 6 Blatchf. 307, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 489.

[b] Patents held interfering.—Gold, etc., Ore Separating Co. v. U. S. Disintegrating Ore Co., 10 F. Cas. No. 5,508, 6 Blatchf 307, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 489.

[c] Patents held not interfering.—Kelly Well Co. v. Kirschke Concrete Well Co., 14 F. (2d) 274; International Signal Co. v. Vreeland Apparatus Co., 278 Fed. 468; Natural Food Co. v. Williams, 163 Fed. 252, 89 CCA 630; Stonemetz Printers' Mach. Co. v. Brown Folding-Mach. Co., 57 Fed. 601 [aff 58 Fed. 571, 7 CCA 374]; Dederick v. Fox, 56 Fed. 714; Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 49 Fed. 370; Pentlarge v. New York Bung, etc., Co., 20 Fed. 314.

67. Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 49 Fed. 370.

68. Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 69 Fed. 346; Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 47 Fed. 522; Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602; American Clay-Bird Co. v. Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co., 31 Fed. 466; Lockwood v. Cleveland, 20 Fed. 164; Pentlarge v. Pentlarge, 19 Fed. 817.

[a] Issue is limited to the question of priority between the interfering patents. American Clay-Bird Co. v. Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co., 31 Fed. 466; Lockwood v. Cleveland, 20 Fed. 164.

[b] Questions not in issue.—(1) Novelty. Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602; Lockwood v. Cleveland, 20 Fed. 164; Pentlarge v. Pentlarge, 19 Fed. 817. (2) Anticipation by other patents. American Clay-Bird Co. v. Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co., 31 Fed. 466. (3) Duration of either patent by reason of the existence of a foreign patent. Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., supra.

69. Foster v. Lindsay, 9 F. Cas. No. 4,975, 1 Bann. & A. 605; Foster v. Lindsay, 9 F. Cas. No. 4,976, 2 Bann. & A. 172, 3 Dill. 126.

[a] The court should adjudge both void if neither has a valid patent. Foster v. Lindsay, 9 F. Cas. No. 4,976, 2 Bann. & A. 172, 3 Dill. 126.

70. Cutler-Hammer Mfg. Co. v. General Electric Co., 6 F. (2d) 376; Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., 227 Fed. 903; Dittgen v. Racine Paper Goods Co., 181 Fed. 394; General Chemical Co. v. Blackmore, 156 Fed. 968; Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 33 CCA 255 [rev 84 Fed. 659].

[a] "The court is bound to determine whether, upon identifying the subject matter of the interfering patents, the invention therein stated is patentable." Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 734, 33 CCA 255 [rev 84 Fed. 659].

71. Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., 227 Fed. 903; Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 33 CCA 255 [rev 84 Fed. 659]; Foster v. Lindsay, 9 F. Cas. No. 4,976, 2 Bann. & A. 172, 3 Dill. 126.

[a] Defenses allowed.—(1) Lack of invention. Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., 227 Fed. 903; Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 33 CCA 255 [rev 84 Fed. 659]. (2) Want of novelty. Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., supra; Foster v. Lindsay, 9 F. Cas. No. 4,976, 2 Bann. & A. 172, 3 Dill. 126. (3) Prior use or sale. Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., supra. (4) No utility. Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co, supra; Dittgen v. Racine Paper Goods Co., 181 Fed. 394. (5) Fraud, inadvertence, negligence, and mistake on the part of the patent office. Dittgen v. Racine Paper Goods Co., supra.

[b] Allegations by defendant that in a prior suit to which he was not a party the court held complainant's patent not in anticipation of or for the same invention as defendant's are irrelevant. Nikola Tesla Co. v. Marconi Wireless Tel. Co., 227 Fed. 903.

72. Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 47 Fed. 522.

73. Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73; Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602.

[§ 280] c. Evidence. There is a prima facie presumption that patents do not interfere.[74] To make out a case, a party must show actual conflict of claims and not mere infringement.[75] In determining the question of interference the court cannot go beyond the claims and consider generally the two inventions as a whole.[76] However, the specifications and designs may be used to throw light upon any doubtful language.[77] The decision of the patent office on an interference is not final upon the question of priority of invention,[78] but it is controlling in a subsequent suit between the same parties unless the contrary is clearly established,[79] and the fact that novelty has been urged in procuring the patent may be considered as evidence thereof in the suit.[80] The fact that no interference was declared argues strongly for the validity of patents which were pending in the patent office at the same time.[81] Depositions there taken are not ordinarily admissible in evidence,[82] nor is the opinion of the commissioner of patents.[83] Evidence as to the state of the art is admissible.[84] There is a rebuttable presumption that the patentee who first filed his application is the first inventor.[85]

[§ 281] d. Judgment and Relief Granted. If there is no patentable invention,[86] or if there is no interference in fact,[87] the bill of complaint will be dismissed. But if there is an interference the court will, as authorized by the statute,[88] adjudge and declare either or both of the patents void, in whole or in part, or inoperative or invalid in a specific part of the United States according to the interest of the parties.[89] Relief by injunction may be granted when necessary to protect the rights of a party.[90] By express statutory provisions,[91] the judgment or decree does not affect the right of any person except the parties to the suit and those deriving title under them subsequent to its rendition.[92]

[§ 282] G. Nonuser.[93] In the United States the nonuse of a patented article will not render the patent void.[94] The inventor does not forfeit his patent or his right to exclude others from using his invention by his failure to make use of it himself,[95] or his refusal to license others to use it upon rea-

76. Kelly Well Co. v. Kirschke Concrete Well Co., 14 F. (2d) 274; Donner v. American Sheet, etc., Co., 160 Fed. 971 [rev 165 Fed. 199, 91 CCA 233]; Stonemetz Printers' Mach. Co. v. Brown Folding-Mach. Co., 57 Fed. 601 [aff 58 Fed. 571, 7 CCA 374]; Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 49 Fed. 370.

[a] Issue is determined by a reference to the claims themselves. Kelly Well Co. v. Kirschke Concrete Well Co., 14 F. (2d) 274.

77. Kelly Well Co. v. Kirschke Concrete Well Co., supra; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Western Electric Co., 72 Fed. 530, 19 CCA 1, 70 Fed. 69, 16 CCA 642.

[a] Evidence is not limited to a mere reading of the specifications and claims, but evidence of the construction and actual operation of each invention is allowed. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Western Electric Co., 72 Fed. 530, 19 CCA 1, 70 Fed. 69, 16 CCA 642.

78. Kuhlke Mach. Co. v. Miller Rubber Co., 8 F. (2d) 614; Sawyer v. Massey, 25 Fed. 144.

[a] Issue of priority of invention is open even though it has once been decided in an interference proceeding. Kuhlke Mach. Co. v. Miller Rubber Co., 8 F. (2d) 614.

[b] Laches in filing the bill after an adverse decision by the commissioner may be considered as bearing on complainant's good faith. Sawyer v. Massey, 25 Fed. 144.

Conclusiveness of decisions of patent office as to priority generally see supra §§ 265, 266.

79. Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73.

[a] Evidence held insufficient.—Miehle Printing Press, etc., Co. v. Miller Saw-Trimmer Co., 2 F. (2d) 744 [aff 6 F. (2d) 417].

Degree of proof generally see supra § 266.

80. Cutler-Hammer Mfg. Co. v. General Electric Co., 6 F. (2d) 376.

[a] Probative value is equivalent to admissions or declarations solemnly and deliberately made by an adversary. Cutler-Hammer Mfg. Co. v. General Electric Co., 6 F. (2d) 376.

81. Farmers' Handy Wagon Co. v. Beaver Silo, etc., Mfg. Co., 236 Fed. 731, 150 CCA 63 [rev 219 Fed. 234].

82. Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73; Clow v. Baker, 36 Fed. 692.

[a] Depositions not admissible where it is not shown that they cannot be retaken. Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73; Clow v. Baker, 36 Fed. 692.

83. Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73.

84. Simplex R. Appliance Co. v. Wands, 115 Fed. 517, 53 CCA 171; Ecaubert v. Appleton, 67 Fed. 917, 15 CCA 73.

[a] Parol evidence to show the state of the art is admissible. Simplex R. Appliance Co. v. Wands, 115 Fed. 517, 53 CCA 171.

85. Sundh Electric Co. v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 198 Fed. 94, 117 CCA 280; American Roll-Paper Co. v. Knopp, 44 Fed. 609; Pelton v. Waters, 19 F. Cas. No. 10,913, 1 Bann. & A. 599.

[a] Thus a prior invention may be shown by the patentee's prior application even though his patent was issued later than the other when there is no evidence to carry the invention of either patentee back of the date of his application. Sundh Electric Co. v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 198 Fed. 94, 117 CCA 280.

[b] Burden of proof.—One applying for a patent, after invention was conceived and reduced to practice by another, must show that his conception was first and reasonable diligence in its reduction to practice. Willoughby v. Rogers, 20 F. (2d) 981; Muther v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 7 F. (2d) 954 [aff 14 F. (2d) 808].

[c] Evidence held sufficient: (1) To show complainant entitled to patent. Clements v. Kirby, 274 Fed. 575; Gillette v. Sendelbach, 146 Fed. 758, 77 CCA 55. (2) To establish priority. Larson v. Crowther, 26 F. (2d) 780 [certiorari den 49 SCt 83 mem]; Earles v. A. W. Drake Mfg. Co., 300 Fed. 265 [aff 289 Fed. 137 (certiorari den 266 U. S. 616 mem, 45 SCt 96 mem, 69 L. ed. 470 mem)]; Dover v. Greenwood, 177 Fed. 946 [rev 194 Fed. 91, 114 CCA 169].

86. International Signal Co. v. Vreeland Apparatus Co., 278 Fed. 468.

87. Boston Pneumatic Power Co. v. Eureka Patents Co., 139 Fed. 29; Dederick v. Fox, 56 Fed. 714; Nathan Mfg. Co. v. Craig, 49 Fed. 370; Pentlarge v. New York Bung, etc., Co., 20 Fed. 314.

[a] Jurisdiction of court does not extend beyond controversies between identical claims. Boston Pneumatic Power Co. v. Eureka Patents Co., 139 Fed. 29.

[b] Motion to dismiss will be denied where it is not raised until final hearing. Dederick v. Fox, 56 Fed. 714.

88. U. S. Code tit 35 § 66.

89. Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 33 CCA 255; Putnam v. Hutchinson, 12 Fed. 131, 11 Biss. 240; Foster v. Lindsay, 9 F. Cas. No. 4,975, 1 Bann. & A. 605.

90. Keystone Trading Co. v. Zapota Mfg. Co., 210 Fed. 456; Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 69 Fed. 346; Sawyer v. Massey, 25 Fed. 144.

[a] Preliminary injunction preventing defendant from disposing of his patent may be granted. Keystone Trading Co. v. Zapota Mfg. Co., 210 Fed. 456.

[b] Litigious complainant may be enjoined from bringing or threatening further suits against defendant. Sawyer v. Massey, 25 Fed. 144.

91. U. S. Code tit 35 § 66.

92. Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 434, 20 L. ed. 858; Knight v. Rite Shoe Co., 23 F. (2d) 903; General Chemical Co. v. Blackmore, 156 Fed. 968; Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 33 CCA 255; Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602; Brush v. Naugatuck R. Co., 24 Fed. 371, 23 Blatchf. 277.

[a] Decree: (1) Binds conclusively all who are brought in and made parties and who claim any right or interest in the invention. Palmer Pneumatic Tire Co. v. Lozier, 90 Fed. 732, 33 CCA 255. (2) Affects one purchasing an interest during the pendency of the suit. Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co., 44 Fed. 602.

[b] Suit on different claims is not prevented. Brush v. Naugatuck R. Co., 24 Fed. 371, 23 Blatchf. 277.

93. Nonuser as ground for annulment proceedings in foreign countries see infra § 283.

94. Continental Paper Bag Co. v. Eastern Paper Bag Co., 210 U. S. 405, 28 SCt 748, 52 L. ed. 1122; McKay-Copeland Lasting Mach. Co. v. Copeland Rapid-Laster Mfg. Co., 77 Fed. 306 [aff 80 Fed. 518, 25 CCA 611]; Packard v. Lacing-Stud Co., 70 Fed. 66, 16 CCA 639; Kling v. Haring, 56 App (D. C.) 153, 11 F. (2d) 202 [certiorari den 271 U. S. 671 mem, 47 SCt 485 mem, 70 L. ed. 1143 mem].

[a] Continued nonuse suggests a question as to the effect of the patent when its validity is in issue. Standard Tobacco Stemmer Co. v. Tobacco Stemming Mach. Co., 237 Fed. 822 [aff 247 Fed. 112, 159 CCA 330].

[b] Thus nonconstruction or nonuse of a machine will not show that the patent is inoperative or overcome the prima facie presumption of its validity. Packard v. Lacing-Stud Co., 70 Fed. 66, 16 CCA 639.

95. Continental Paper Bag Co. v.

sonable terms.[96] The question of licensing others to use his invention is one which the patentee alone has the right to answer, and courts cannot compel him to make use of his invention, or to permit others to use it against his will.[97]

[§ 283] H. Annulment or Repeal. The authority to set aside a patent, or to annul it, is vested in the courts of the United States.[98] It does not reside in any officer of the government,[99] or in the patent office.[1] Impeachment of letters patent cannot occur in a collateral proceeding,[2] but must take place in a proceeding had directly for that purpose.[3] Only the United States can maintain a suit for the cancellation of a patent.[4] However, it has been held

Johnston, 59 Fed. 613; Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., 49 Fed. 930; Consolidated Roller-Mill Co. v. Coombs, 39 Fed. 803.

[a] Injunction to prevent infringement will not be denied on the ground of nonuse. Continental Paper Bag Co. v. Eastern Paper Bag Co., 210 U. S. 405, 28 SCt 748, 52 L. ed. 1122 [overr Hoe v. Knap, 17 Fed. 204]; Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., 49 Fed. 930; Consolidated Roller Mill Co. v. Coombs, 39 Fed. 803.

[b] Nonuse of patent: (1) Cannot be material element in determining whether monopoly exists. Indiana Lamp Co. v. Alvo Mfg. Co., 296 Fed. 623. (2) Will not affect right to exclude competitors. Wine R. Appliance Co. v. Enterprise R. Equipment Co., 25 F. (2d) 236.

[c] Exception, unless an intention is shown to abandon the invention. American Brake Shoe, etc., Co. v. Hoadley Brake Shoe Co., 222 Fed. 327 [aff 227 Fed. 90, 141 CCA 638].

[d] In Canada (1) the patentee's failure to manufacture the invention within two years, or the importation of it, will invalidate the patent. 35 Vict. c 26 § 28; 38 Vict. c 14 § 2; Power v. Griffin, 33 Can. S. C. 39; Hambly v. Albright & Wilson, Ltd., 7 Can. Exch. 363; Auer Incandescent Light Mfg. Co., Ltd. v. O'Brien, 5 Can. Exch. 243; Consolidated Car Heating Co. v. Came, 18 Que. Super. 44. (2) Offering to license the invention is not sufficient. Hildreth v. McCormick Mfg. Co., Ltd., 39 Can. S. C. 499 [dism app 10 Can. Exch. 378]. (3) Importation of parts will not invalidate. Anderson Tire Co. v. American Dunlop Tire Co., 5 Can. Exch. 82. (4) Trifling and accidental importation will not invalidate. Consolidated Car Heating Co. v. Came, supra.

"The only authority competent to set a patent aside, or to annul it, or to correct it, for any reason whatever, is vested in the judicial department of the government, and this can only be effected by proper proceedings taken in the courts of the United States." U. S. v. American Bell Tel. Co., supra.

[a] State court does not have jurisdiction of a direct suit to repeal a patent. Merserole v. Union Paper Collar Co., 17 F. Cas. No. 9,488, 6 Blatchf. 356, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 483.

[b] Expired patent.—A court has no jurisdiction to vacate extension after its expiration. Bourne v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 811, 19 L. ed. 786.

[c] In England (1) a petition for revocation presented subsequent to an application to amend does not deprive the comptroller of jurisdiction to allow the amendment. Woolfe v. Automatic Picture Gallery, Ltd., [1903] 1 Ch. 18 [aff [1902] W. N. 137]. (2) A petition for revocation of a patent should be heard in open court, and not in chambers, even by consent. In re Clifton, [1904] 2 Ch. 357. (3) When the ground of revocation is want of novelty of part of the invention, the court may order it revoked unless leave to amend by disclaimer is obtained. Deeley v. Perkes, [1896] A. C. 496, 20 ERC 825. (4) If the patentee is not the first inventor of a material part of the invention, the court should revoke the patent and it has no power to exclude from it the part of which the patentee is not the first inventor. In re Ralston, 100 L. T. Rep. N. S. 386.

that an inventor may bring a bill to obtain an accounting and a decree declaring letters patent void against one who fraudulently patented the secret after it had been confidentially disclosed to him.[5] As to whether a suit shall be instituted is determined by the attorneys for the government,[6] and, if so, when and where.[7] Suit may be maintained by the government, not only when it has a proprietary and pecuniary interest in the result, but also when it is necessary to enable it to discharge its obligations to the public,[8] and sometimes when the purpose and effect are simply to enforce the rights of an individual.[9] Annulment proceedings may be instituted on the ground of fraud in procuring the patent;[10] but the government cannot maintain a suit to repeal on grounds that have been sustained in a suit for infringement,[11] nor ask an injunction restraining the commencement or prosecution of suits for infringement of a patent for the repeal of which they have begun an action.[12] In certain foreign countries, additional grounds for revocation, such as nonuser or importation from abroad, exist.[13] The appropriate remedy is by a bill in equity.[14] Prayers for the cancellation of two patents relating to the same subject and owned by the same parties may be joined.[15] Before a decree canceling a patent for fraud can be granted, actual fraud must be established by testimony which is clear, convincing, and satisfactory.[16] A judgment of cancellation is good against the world.[17]

[§ 284] I. Estoppel To Dispute Validity—1. In General. The issuance of a patent does not estop the patentee from proving that the invention claimed therein is not novel, provided he has acted in good faith in the matter.[18] A patentee is, however, estopped to deny the correctness of the description of the existing art in the specification,[19] or that improvements in a patented machine covered by a second patent to him are merely mechanical and do not involve invention.[20] So, also, a patentee who secures

[a] In England (1) the patentee, if he fails to manufacture under his patent within four years after its grant, may have it revoked. He may also be required to grant a license under it on terms to be fixed. Act (1907) c 29 §§ 27, 24. (2) The Patents and Designs Act of 1919 does not render a patent liable to revocation on grounds more extensive than those on which the grant might have been opposed. In re Ucar, [1922] 2 Ch. 220. (3) A patent granted before 1919 cannot be revoked on the ground of prior publication in an earlier British specification. In re Ucar, supra. (4) Prior publication is a sufficient ground for revocation. In re Stahlwerk Becker Aktiengesellschaft, 36 R. P. C. 13; In re Daimler-Motoren Gesellschaft Patent, 35 R. P. C. 253. (5) The mere fact that a patent has expired is not a sufficient reason why a petition for its revocation should not be presented. North Eastern Mar. Engineering Co. v. Leeds Forge Co., [1906] 2 Ch. 498 [aff [1906] 1 Ch. 324]. (6) An action merely to declare invalid letters patent already expired, where no legal right of the plaintiff has been infringed is not maintainable. North Eastern Mar. Engineering Co. v. Leeds Forge Co., supra.

[b] In Canada (1) letters patent cannot be annulled because of expiration of a foreign patent upon a proceeding by scire facias. Reg. v. General Engineering Co., 6 Can. Exch. 328. (2) Failure to manufacture in Canada within two years, or importation from abroad, are grounds for annulment proceedings. Power v. Griffin, 33 Can. S. C. 39; Hambly v. Albright & Wilson, Ltd., 7 Can. a correction limiting the life of his patent is estopped, as against infringers, to deny the validity of the limitation.[21] Furthermore other persons associated with him in the ownership of rights under the patent are also estopped, in the absence of an affirmative showing that they were ignorant of his acts in procuring the limitation.[22] The owner of a patent originally sued upon, but abandoned, may show that it is inoperative after defendant has introduced it in evidence in order to show the state of the prior art.[23] An estoppel of the patentee by the file history of the patent can be considered only on the question of infringement, and not on the question of validity.[24]

An interference in the patent office will not estop the defeated applicant from assailing the validity of the patent upon grounds other than priority,[25] or from claiming the invention only an improvement on an invention covered by a prior patent of his.[26] A party who, in an interference, asserted the validity of its patent until it became the owner of the pending application when it abandoned its contention and secured the issuance of a patent, is estopped to assert the validity of the second patent.[27]

The doctrine of estoppel should not be extended to persons to whom it is not clearly applicable.[28]

[§ 285] 2. Estoppel of Infringer. An infringer cannot deny the utility of the invention,[29] or allege that the patent was procured by fraud and collusion or by illegal procedure,[30] although he may deny its novelty;[31] nor can he deny that the patentee is the first inventor when he has acquiesced in the patentee's claim.[32] And it has been held that one making use of another's patent mark is estopped to deny the validity of the patent.[33]

Inconsistent positions. The fact that a party had filed an application for a patent for the same or a similar device will not estop him from denying the validity of the patent,[34] but one who joined in an application for reissue is estopped to assert that the patent obtained on such application is void.[35] So, where a defendant in an infringement suit by his answer asserts the validity of a patent granted to him, he is estopped to claim that a similar patent granted to plaintiff is void for lack of patentability.[36]

[§ 286] 3. Estoppel of Assignor and Licensor. An assignor[37] of a patent is, as against his as-

[a] Purchase and use of patented article while prices are satisfactory will not estop attack on its novelty. California Fruit Growers' Exch. v. Blake, 19 F. (2d) 467 [rev 14 F. (2d) 756].

[b] In Newfoundland novelty cannot be denied where a foreign patent was issued prior to the grant there. Cabot S. Whaling Co. v. Newfoundland S. Whaling Co., 9 Newfoundl. 122.

32. Beecroft & Blackman, Inc. v. Rooney, 268 Fed. 545 [rev on other grounds 280 Fed. 543].

[a] Thus infringers, who, when advised by the patentee of his intent to obtain a patent, they to have the shop right, without objection acquiesced, and manufactured the device, are estopped to deny that the patentee is the first inventor. Beecroft & Blackman, Inc. v. Rooney, 268 Fed. 545 [rev on other grounds 280 Fed. 543].

[b] Rule applied.—In a suit for infringement of letters patent, it has been held that recognition of the validity of the patent during fourteen years' litigation in other suits is sufficient to justify the court in refusing to consider the question as open to consideration. Ryder v. Beaver Silo, etc., Mfg. Co., 219 Fed. 242.

[a] Basis for estoppel (1) is that assignor, having received a valuable consideration, may not derogate from his grant by denying that it had any value. Babcock, etc., Co. v. Toledo Boiler Works Co., 170 Fed. 81, 95 CCA 363. (2) Basis for estoppel is that the vendor patentee has received and retained a valuable thing in consideration of the statements contained in the application for, or specification of, the patent. Therefore, when an assignment is made pending the application for a patent, it is immaterial whether or not the vendor may have made representations to the purchasers concerning the probability of obtaining a patent. Nor is it material that the purchasers knew that the thing sought to be patented was old, when they understood that the patent was sought for a new application and use of it. National Conduit Mfg. Co. v. Connecticut Pipe Mfg. Co., 73 Fed. 491.

[b] Transfer of stock of a corporation owning a patent by another corporation is not such an assignment of the patent as will create an estoppel. Electric R. Co. v. Jamaica, etc., R. Co., 61 Fed. 655.

[c] Estoppel extends: (1) To all the claims in the patent. Mathews Gravity Carrier Co. v. Lister, 154 Fed. 490. (2) To every structure within the fair meaning of the claim. Leader Plow Co. v. Bridgewater Plow Co., 237 Fed. 376, 150 CCA 390; United Printing Mach. Co. v. Cross Paper Feeder Co., 227 Fed. 600, 142 CCA 232 [mod 220 Fed. 313]. (3) Where application is assigned to claims within the scope of the original disclosure, although not made in the application as filed. National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 283 Fed. 196; Dynamic Balancing Mach. Co. v. Akimoff, 279 Fed. 285 [mod on other grounds 285 Fed. 480]; Foltz Smokeless Furnace Co. v. Eureka Smokeless Furnace Co., 256 Fed. 847, 168 CCA 193. (4) To reissues as well as to originals. Burdsall v. Curran, 31 Fed. 918.

[d] Estoppel applies: (1) Against the assignor of a part interest to a partner in favor of the assignee of the partner's interest through bankruptcy proceedings. Fishel Nessler Co. v. Fishel, 204 Fed. 790, 123 CCA 142. (2) Even though assignee, at the time of the assignment, knew facts which would render the patent invalid. Peelle Co. v. Raskin, 194 Fed. 440 [rev on other grounds 222 Fed. 293, 138 CCA 19].

[e] Assignor cannot claim: (1) That the patent has been anticipated by prior inventions. United Printing Mach. Co. v. Cross Paper Feeder Co., 227 Fed. 600, 142 CCA 232 [mod 220 Fed. 313]; Schiebel Toy, etc., Co. v. Clark, 217 Fed. 760, 133 CCA 490 [certiorari den 235 U. S. 707 mem, 35 SCt 283 mem, 59 L. ed. 434 mem]; Martin, etc., Cash-Carrier Co. v. Martin, 67 Fed. 786, 14 CCA 642. (2) That patent lacks novelty. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Formica Insulation Co., 266 U. S. 342, 45 SCt 117, 69 L. ed. 316 [aff 288 Fed. 330]; United Printing Mach. Co. v. Cross Paper Feeder Co., supra; Schiebel Toy, etc., Co. v. Clark, supra; Griffith v. Shaw, 89 Fed. 313; Martin, etc., Cash-Carrier Co. v. Martin, supra; Babcock v. Clarkson, 63 Fed. 607, 11 CCA 351; Woodward v. Boston Lasting Mach. Co., 60 Fed. 283, 8 CCA 622. (3) That patent lacks utility. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Formica Insulation Co., 266 U. S. 342, 45 SCt 117, 69 L. ed. 316 [aff 288 Fed. 330]; United Printing Mach. Co. v. Cross Paper Feeder Co., 227 Fed. 600, 142 CCA 232 [mod 220 Fed. 313]; Schiebel Toy, etc., Co. v. Clark, 217 Fed. 760, 133 CCA 490 [certiorari den 235 U. (4) That patent infringes another patent owned by him. Adee v. Thomas, 41 Fed. 346; Curran v. Burdsall, 20 Fed. 835.

[f] A patentee whose wife has sold the patent to another is estopped to deny its validity. Onderdonk v. Fanning, 4 Fed. 148.

[g] An employee assignor who left plaintiff's employ after the patent was applied for, but before it was granted, is estopped. Johnson Automatic Scale Co. v. Ginn, 10 F. (2d) 793.

[h] Waiver of estoppel does not occur by introduction of other patents as bearing on the question of infringement where waiver is expressly disclaimed. Martin Gauge Co. v. Pollock, 251 Fed. 295 [aff 261 Fed. 201].

38. New York Phonograph Co. v. National Phonograph Co., 163 Fed. 534; Seal v. Beach, 113 Fed. 831; Smith v. Ridgely, 103 Fed. 875, 43 CCA 365; Oscar Barnett Fdy. Co. v. Crow, 80 N. J. Eq. 112, 258, 86 A 915; Smith v. Scott, 6 C. B. N. S. 771, 95 ECL 771, 141 Reprint 654; Clark v. Adie, 21 Wkly. Rep. 456 [aff 21 Wkly. Rep. 764].

[a] Licensor is estopped to claim that patents expired before the term for which granted by reason of expiration of prior foreign patents. New York Phonograph Co. v. National Phonograph Co., 163 Fed. 534.

39. Welsbach Light Co. v. Cohn, 181 Fed. 122; Johnson Furnace, etc., Co. v. Western Furnace Co., 178 Fed. 819, 102 CCA 267; Force v. Sawyer-Boss Mfg. Co., 111 Fed. 902 [aff 113 Fed. 1018, 51 CCA 592].

[a] The estoppel "rests upon the broad and equitable doctrine that one who receives and retains a portion of the fruits of a sale of a patent which he has assisted in making to another is estopped from claiming that such patent is invalid and worthless." Johnson Furnace, etc., Co. v. Western Furnace Co., 178 Fed. 819, 822, 102 CCA 267.

[b] Thus a stockholder in a corporation organized for the purpose of taking title to a patent and selling it, and who participated in the sale and received his share of the profits, is estopped. Welsbach Light Co. v. Cohn, 181 Fed. 122.

40. Frick Co. v. Lindsay, 27 F. (2d) 59; Premier Register Table Co. v. West, 21 F. (2d) 762; National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 283 Fed. 196; Martin Gauge Co. v. Pollock, 251 Fed. 295 [aff 261 Fed. 201]; Mergenthaler Linotype Co. v. International Typesetting Mach. Co., 229 Fed. 168 [mod on other grounds 229 Fed. 407, 143 CCA 527, and certiorari den 243 U. Carroll, 141 Fed. 992; Continental Wire Fence Co. v. Pendergast, 126 Fed. 381; Force v. Sawyer-Boss Mfg. Co., 111 Fed. 902 [aff 113 Fed. 1018, 51 CCA 592]; Boston Lasting Mach. Co. v. Woodward, 82 Fed. 97, 27 CCA 69 [aff 75 Fed. 272]; Daniel v. Miller, 81 Fed. 1000; Time Tel. Co. v. Himmer, 19 Fed. 322, 22 Blatchf. 34.

[a] Privity (1) does not exist between joint wrongdoers. National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 283 Fed. 196 [aff 286 Fed. 367]. (2) Privity of a corporation is not established by its employment of the assignor of a patent who designed and aided in the manufacture of an infringing machine, he having no title or interest in it. National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 283 Fed. 196 [aff 286 Fed. 367] (where the court refused to follow Mergenthaler Linotype Co. v. International Typesetting Mach. Co., 229 Fed. 168 [mod on other grounds 229 Fed. 407, 143 CCA 527 (certiorari den 243 U. S. 642 mem, 37 SCt 404 mem, 61 L. ed. 943 mem)]).

[b] Employer of assignor (1) who hired him for the purpose of designing a competing device is estopped. Robert Findley Mfg. Co. v. Hygrade Lighting Fixture Corp., 275 Fed. 362; Mergenthaler Linotype Co. v. International Typesetting Mach. Co., 229 Fed. 168 [mod on other grounds 229 Fed. 407, 143 CCA 527, and certiorari den 243 U. S. 642 mem, 37 SCt 404 mem, 61 L. ed. 943 mem]. (2) He is not estopped by reason of the engagement of the assignor in a subordinate position. Boston Lasting Mach. Co. v. Woodward, 82 Fed. 97, 27 CCA 69 [aff 75 Fed. 272].

[c] No estoppel of defendants who subsequently became associated with assignor of a patent where the relations between them are not shown. St. Louis St. Flushing Mach. Co. v. Sanitary St. Flushing Mach. Co., 161 Fed. 725, 88 CCA 585.

[d] Third person who furnishes money to make and sell infringing device is also estopped. Martin Gauge Co. v. Pollock, 251 Fed. 295 [aff 261 Fed. 201].

[e] Wife of assignor, engaged with him in the manufacture of an infringing device, is estopped. Frick Co. v. Lindsay, 27 F. (2d) 59.

a partnership,[41] or a corporation[42] in which he is interested may be estopped. However, the assignor may testify as to its invalidity in a suit between his assignee and a third party.[43] As to the rest of the world the patent may be void, but the assignor is estopped from urging that defense against his assignee.[44] The assignor is not estopped, however, to deny infringement,[45] and for this purpose he may show the prior state of the art so as to limit the scope of the patent assigned.[46]

41. Alvin Mfg. Co. v. Scharling, 100 Fed. 87.

[a] Thus a partnership of which assignor is a member and manager is estopped. Alvin Mfg. Co. v. Scharling, 100 Fed. 87.

42. Robeson Process Co. v. Robeson, 293 Fed. 70 [aff 1 F. (2d) 1022 mem (certiorari den 267 U. S. 597 mem, 45 SCt 352 mem, 69 L. ed. 806 mem)]; Dynamic Balancing Mach. Co. v. [a] Bona fide stockholder for value will not relieve the corporation from the effect of estoppel. Mellor v. Carroll, 141 Fed. 992.

[b] Joint infringement.—A corporation acting jointly with the assignors of a patent in infringing it are estopped to deny its validity. Climax Lock, etc., Co. v. Ajax Hardware Mfg. Co., 192 Fed. 126.

[c] Estoppel extends: (1) To a corporation which assignor was instrumental in forming and in which he is a stockholder. Robeson Process Co. v. Robeson, 293 Fed. 70 [aff 1 F. (2d) 1022 mem (certiorari den 267 U. S. 597 mem, 45 SCt 352 mem, 69 L. ed. 806 mem)]; Martin Gauge Co. v. Pollock, 251 Fed. 295 [aff 261 Fed. 201]; Crown Cork, etc., Co. v. Lister, 154 Fed. 490; Siemens-Halske Electric Co. v. Duncan Electric Mfg. Co., 142 Fed. 157, 73 CCA 375 [certiorari den 200 U. S. 622 mem, 26 SCt 758 mem, 50 L. ed. 624 mem]; Marvel Co. v. Pearl, 114 Fed. 946; National Conduit Mfg. Co. v. Connecticut Pipe Mfg. Co., 73 Fed. 491. (2) To a corporation organized by the assignor of a patent, of which he is manager and in which his wife owns stock. Onondaga Indian Wigwam Co. v. Ka-Noo-No Indian Mfg. Co., 182 Fed. 832. (3) To a corporation organized by the party who aided in the sale of the patent. Johnson Furnace, etc., Co. v. Western Furnace Co., 178 Fed. 819, 102 CCA 267. (4) To a corporation which commenced business under license from the assignor of other patents, who became its general manager. Leader Plow Co. v. Bridgewater Plow Co., 237 Fed. 376, 150 CCA 390. (5) To a corporation building infringing apparatus under orders from a corporation organized and controlled by the assignor of the patent. Roessing-Ernst Co. v. Coal, etc., By-Products Co., 219 Fed. 898, 135 CCA 562 [aff 212 Fed. 434].

[d] Estoppel does not extend: (1) Of necessity to a corporation in which the assignor subsequently becomes officer and stockholder. Macey Co. v. Globe-Wernicke Co., 180 Fed. 401, 103 CCA 547; Corbin Cabinet Lock Co. v Yale, etc., Mfg. Co., 58 Fed. 563. (2) To a corporation, who with knowledge of the ownership of a patent by an assignee, contracted with the assignor for the use of a later improvement made by him. Trussed Concrete Steel Co. v. Corrugated Bar Co., 214 Fed. 393 [aff 222 Fed. 514, 138 CCA 114 (certiorari den 241 U. S. 681 mem, 36 SCt 728 mem, 60 L. ed. 1234 mem)]. (3) To a corporation merely because the assignor of the patent is a subordinate in its employment. Babcock, etc., Co. v. Toledo Boiler Works Co., 170 Fed. 81, 95 CCA 363.

"Although these defendants may not be heard to contend that the patent is void for lack of invention, they are entitled, as any one else would be, to whatever narrow construction the language of the claims may warrant and the condition of the prior art may require." Standard Plunger El. Co. v. Stokes, 212 Fed. 941, 943, 129 CCA 461.

[a] State of the art: (1) Is not admissible to destroy the patent and defeat the grant. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Formica Insulation Co., 266 U. S. 342, 45 SCt 117, 69 L. ed. 316 [aff 288 Fed. 330]; Cross Paper Feeder Co. v. United Printing Mach. Co., 220 Fed. 313 [mod on other grounds 227 Fed. 600, 142 CCA 232]. (2) May be used to construe and narrow the claims of the patent, conceding their validity. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Formica Insulation Co., supra.

[b] Evidence not admissible: (1) For the ostensible purpose of narrowing the scope of a patent, but which in effect attacks its validity. Piano Motors Corp. v. Motor Player Corp., 282 Fed. 435; Alvin Mfg. Co. v. Scharling, 100 Fed. 87. (2) To narrow the patent's scope to a point which would render it valueless. Automatic Switch Co. v. Monitor Mfg. Co., 180 Fed. 983; Hurwood Mfg. Co. v. Wood, 138 Fed. 835.

[c] Construction (1) narrower than that used to induce the sale cannot be claimed. United Printing Mach. Co. v. Cross Paper Feeder Co., 227 Fed. 600, 142 CCA 232 [mod 220 Fed. 313]. (2) Construction of the patent and its scope as limited by the prior art must be determined by the same rule which would be applied between the patentee and a stranger. Robeson Process Co. v. Robeson, 293 Fed. 70 [aff 1 F. (2d) 1022 mem (certiorari den 267 U. S. 597 mem, 45 SCt 352 mem, 69 L. ed. 806 mem)].

[§ 287] 4. Estoppel of Licensee or Assignee—a. Effect of License Generally. In general a licensee is estopped to deny the validity of the patent during the continuance of the license.[47] Thus, in an action for the recovery of royalties under a contract of license[48] if the licensee has acted under an apparently valid patent he is estopped to set up the invalidity of the patent as a defense to prevent recovery,[49] except where such invalidity amounts to a failure of consideration or occasions an eviction of the licensee from an enjoyment of benefits under the license;[50] and if the patent has been annulled or declared void by due and effective legal proceedings,[51] or if the licensee has repudiated the contract,[52] such a defense may be set up. In an infringement upon other prior patents. Rhodes v. Ashurst, supra.

[b] Licensee is not estopped to purchase valid patent subsequently issued to another, and to assert his patent by suit against all infringers including his licensor. Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. American Graphophone Co., 189 Fed. 359 [aff 190 Fed. 1023 mem, 111 CCA 675 mem].

[c] Reasons for rule are that the party has got what he bargained for; that he cannot be allowed at the same time to affirm and disaffirm the contract, and that he cannot in this way force the patentee into a defense of his right and compel him to try it in a collateral action. Marston v. Swett, 82 N. Y. 526.

[d] Express clause not to question validity is not necessary. Eskimo Pie Corp. v. National Ice Cream Co., 20 F. (2d) 1003 [aff 26 F. (2d) 901]; L. Heller & Sons, Inc. v. Lassner Co., 214 App. Div. 315, 212 NYS 175; Montgomery v. Waterbury, 2 Misc. 145, 21 NYS 631 [aff 142 N. Y. 652 mem, 37 NE 569 mem]; Imperial Supply Co. v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 13 Can. Exch. 507, 1 DomLR 243, 10 EastLR 414.

[e] Estoppel by patent license: (1) Is by deed and does not depend on user of the device licensed. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Pressed Steel Car Co., 243 Fed. 883, 156 CCA 395 [certiorari den 245 U. S. 652 mem, 38 SCt 11 mem, 62 L. ed. 532 mem]. (2) Is an estoppel implied by law. Ferry-Hallock Co. v. Progressive Paper Box Co., 76 N. J. Eq. 1, 73 A 230.

[f] Prior art is not admissible to show invalidity of patent. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Pressed Steel Car Co., 243 Fed. 883, 156 CCA 395 [certiorari den 245 U. S. 652 mem, 38 SCt 11 mem, 62 L. ed. 532 mem].

[g] Rule applies (1) to reissued patent. Hyatt v. Ingalls, 49 N. Y. Super. 375 [aff 124 N. Y. 93, 26 NE 289 mem]. (2) In case of implied license where patentee was director of defendant corporation which had enjoyed the use of the patent. Deane v. Hodge, 35 Minn. 146, 27 NW 917, 59 AmR 321. (3) In action to recover royalties due before notice of repudiation of license. Ely v. Topliff, 41 Oh. St. 357.

[h] Rule does not apply where defendant ceased to infringe upon discovery that it was mistaken in its belief that it had a license. Schulte v. Colorado Tire, etc., Co., 259 Fed. 562, 170 CCA 524.

"The rule is that a licensee is estopped to deny the validity of the patent as long as he is acting under it." Tate v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 229 Fed. 141, 143 CCA 417.

[a] Licensee is estopped to claim: (1) That the invention lacks novelty. Rhodes v. Ashurst, 176 Ill. 351, 52 NE 118; Clark v. Adie, 2 App. Cas. 423; Beam v. Merner, 14 Ont. 412. (2) That the invention lacks utility. Clark v. Adie, supra. (3) That the specification is insufficient. Clark v. Adie, supra. (4) That the patent is fringement suit there is no estoppel,[53] even though defendant sets up the alternative defense that he was acting under a license,[54] especially if the licensor either repudiates the license or considers it as having been forfeited,[55] or sues on the basis that the licensee is infringing by operating outside the scope of his license.[56] But in an action to prevent infringement by a licensee in which plaintiff is not seeking to cancel the license, the invalidity of the patent cannot be set up as a defense.[57] The licensee may show that what he has done is not within the terms of the patent,[58] and for this purpose he may show the state of the art as bearing upon the scope of the patent.[59] A licensee cannot dispute the validity of the patent for the purpose of avoiding carrying out the conditions of sale or license,[60] so a licensee, the owner of a conflicting patent, who contracted to avoid a conflict and divide the royalty, is estopped to deny the validity of the licensor's patent.[61]

Corporation or stockholders. A corporation is not estopped by a personal license to a stockholder.[62] Nor is an officer of the corporation estopped by a license to the corporation.[63]

[§ 288] b. Option or Offer To Take a License. A mere offer to take a license will not operate as an estoppel,[64] nor will an option to take a license.[65]

[§ 289] c. Implied License. An allegation of an implied license is not sufficient upon which to found an estoppel.[66]

[§ 290] d. Expired License. The fact that a party once operated under a license will not estop him from disputing the validity of the patent.[67] Thus, a former licensee is not estopped from questioning the validity of a patent after the termination of his license as a defense to acts done subsequent to its termination,[68] unless there was an agreement by him to that effect.[69]

[§ 291] e. Effect of Assignment. An assignee who has acted under an assignment is estopped to deny the validity of the patent.[70]

[§ 292] 5. Estoppel by Trade Agreements or Compromises. A mere mercantile agreement not to deal in certain patented machines does not operate as an estoppel to deny the validity of the patent.[71] A covenant or agreement not to infringe estops the parties thereto from controverting the validity of the patent,[72] but a sales agency contract does not estop the agent after the contract has been terminated.[73] An arrangement between two patentees, by way of compromise to avoid litigation, for the mutual use of their respective patents will not estop either party or his assigns or licensees to deny the validity of the other's patent.[74]

[§ 293] 6. Estoppel of Employees. An employee is not estopped by the allegations of or decision against his employer in a former action.[75]

[a] Action is one in tort and not in contract and therefore estoppel does not operate. Paramount Hosiery Form Drying Co. v. Moorhead Knitting Co., 251 Fed. 897 [aff 260 Fed. 841, 171 CCA 567].

[b] Purchaser of patented article is not bound to accept the position of a licensee and is not estopped from attacking the validity of a patent in an action for infringement. Gillette Safety Razor Co. v. Gamage, 25 T. L. R. 808.

[a] Estoppel is confined to particular device covered by the lease or license. T. H. Symington Co. v. National Malleable Castings Co., 257 Fed. 564; Dunham v. Bent, 72 Fed. 60.

[b] Thus, licensee is not estopped to question the validity of patents subsequently issued not referred to in the agreement and covering devices not shown to have been then conceived. IX. TERM

[By Rudy J. Brossman]

[§ 294] A. Beginning of Term. The patentee has no monopoly until the patent has been issued,[76] it being the legislative intention that the term shall run from that time.[77]

Effect of amendment or correction. Where, owing to the omission of an essential element, the patent must be corrected, the date of such correction is the date of the patent,[78] although it has been said that the date of application for an amendment is the effective date of the patent, where the claims are built wholly on the amendment.[79]

[§ 295] B. Duration of Term—1. Mechanical Patents. All mechanical patents granted in the United States upon applications filed after December 31, 1897, have a term of seventeen years from the date of the grant.[80] The term of seventeen years was fixed by the act of 1861.[81] But between that date and the time the act of March 3, 1897, went into effect, patents were limited to expire with foreign patents upon the invention.[82] Under section 8, the act of 1897 applied only to patents granted on applications filed after December 31, 1897.[83]

[§ 296] 2. Designs. The term of a design patent is three and one-half, seven, or fourteen years, as elected in the application for patent.[84]

[§ 297] 3. Reissues. A reissued patent is operative only for the unexpired part of the term of the original patent.[85]

[§ 298] 4. Limitation by Foreign Patent—a. In General. Patents granted upon applications filed before January 1, 1898, are by statute limited to expire at the same time as any foreign patent previously procured by or for the United States patentee having the shortest term to run.[86] The question of secrecy or publicity of the foreign patent does not prevent the limitation.[87] To act as a limitation, however, the foreign patent must be procured by the United States patentee or by his consent or be ratified by him.[88] It would be manifestly unjust that a patentee should lose the full fruits of his patent by the fact that some intermeddler had caused the invention to be patented abroad.[89] A provisional

[a] Assignment of right to patent.—The fact that an applicant for a patent assigned his right thereto to another before applying for and obtaining a foreign patent for the invention which was issued before the one in this country will not prevent the latter from being limited to the term of the foreign patent. John R. Williams Co. v. Miller, etc., Mfg. Co., 115 Fed. 526.

[b] "Term."—The word "term," used in reference to a foreign patent, when more than one such patent exists, indicates that the time of expiration as to be ascertained by the term of the patent, was meant as the time of duration. Paillard v. Bruno, 29 Fed. 864, 865.

patent issued in a foreign country which merely secures the applicant against the effects of publication for three years and entitles him to a definitive patent on making the required proofs of the existence of either the article itself or a model thereof within that time is not such a patent as is referred to in the statute,[90] and a foreign patent void ab initio will not limit or invalidate the United States patent.[91] The rule is otherwise, however, as to a patent issued by virtue of the recognized lawful authority vested in the king of a foreign country, although there was no patent law in the shape of a legislative enactment.[92] Failure to limit the patent on its face so as to expire at the same time with the prior foreign patent having the shortest time does not affect its validity.[93] Although the patentee procures the "correction" of a patent limiting it to expire with a foreign patent, which attempted "correction" is void for want of jurisdiction of the commissioner to make it, he is not estopped to claim that the patent was in force for the full term of its life as originally fixed.[94]

In England the patent expired with any foreign patent granted before the English patent.[95]

In Canada the patent expired with any foreign patent in existence during the life of the Canadian patent.[96]

[§ 299] b. Identity of Invention. It is not necessary that the patents be identical in all particulars, or that the inventions disclosed therein be identical, since it is sufficient if upon examination of the two instruments it appears that substantially the same thing is intended to be covered thereby.[97] A difference in mere detail does not avoid identity,[98] unless such difference affects the essence of the invention in a patentable sense.[99] And a foreign patent and a subsequent American patent are not for different inventions because the latter contains a more genuine claim, which covers the specific form of device described in the former, and other forms as well.[1] But a prior patent in a foreign country for a minor part of a broad or basic invention is not for the same invention as a subsequent United States patent covering both the minor parts and the broad main invention.[2] When American letters patent are issued covering the same invention described in foreign letters patent of an earlier date, the life of the American patent is not prolonged by the fact that it also covers improvements upon the invention as patented in a foreign country.[3] It is necessary that the foreign patent claim the same invention; it is not sufficient that it disclose the invention of the later United States patent, where it is not claimed therein.[4]

[§ 300] c. Date of Foreign Patent. To limit a United States patent the foreign patent must have been actually sealed and issued before the date of the United States patent, and the antedating of a foreign patent will not make it limit a patent here which was actually granted first.[5] Dates of actual issue and not the dates of application control.[6]

[§ 301] d. Term of Foreign Patent. The term of a foreign patent is the time which the patentee may, as a matter of right, keep it in force under the law of the country.[7] It includes not merely the term

mentioned in the grant, but any extension thereof which may be procured at the option of the patentee, and it is immaterial whether or not such extension is actually procured.[8] The judgment of the courts of the foreign country as to the meaning of its laws and the term of the patents is controlling.[9]

[§ 302] e. Lapse or Expiration of Foreign Patent. Where, at the time that the United States patent is granted, a foreign patent is in force, granted for a certain term, and that patent subsequently lapses through failure to pay fees or taxes or for similar cause, the United States patent does not lapse with the foreign patent, but extends throughout the original term of the foreign patent.[10] The life of a United States patent must be certain from the day of the grant.[11] Where the foreign patent expired or lapsed for any cause before the grant of the United States patent, the United States patent is void.[12]

[§ 303] 5. Effect of Expiration. The rights of monopoly given by a patent expire with its term, and others are free to make and sell the thing patented,[13] subject only to the rule against unfair competition.[14] An old element, whose patent monopoly has expired, cannot, by being put into a new patented combination, have its individual monopoly revived.[15] The term of a patent of a more general nature is not limited by the expiration of a patent for a specific form previously issued.[16]

[§ 304] C. Extensions—1. In General. An extension of a patent is a prolongation of the term.[17] A renewal when used in this sense is the same thing,[18] but not when used to designate a new patent taken out after the surrender of an old one.[19] The state has a perfect right to extend or renew a patent,[20] or refuse to do so.[21]

[§ 305] 2. Right to Extension—a. In United States. There is no general act of congress permitting the extension of patents, and therefore patents can now be extended only by special acts of congress.[22] Congress, however, as is shown by a very considerable number of decisions, has authority to extend the term of patents either by general law or special act.[23]

[§ 306] b. In England and British Dominions. In England,[24] and some of the dominions of the British Empire,[25] the term of a patent may be extended. Assignees may secure an extension,[26] but their claims are not viewed so favorably as those of the original patentee.[27] An importer also may secure an extension, but is not looked upon favorably.[28] The extension may be granted on conditions.[29] The invention must have merit and public utility and the patentee must have been insufficiently remunerated.[30] The petition for extension must state everything fully and fairly and must include a complete account of profits.[31] Expenses, etc., must be deducted in estimating profits,[32] and the failure of profits must be shown not to be due to the failure to make proper efforts.[33] An extension will be refused where the patent is not sufficiently useful,[34] or where it is void;[35] the expiration of foreign patents for the same invention is a serious obstacle to the success of an applicant for prolongation.[36] The petition must be filed before the expiration of the prescribed time,[37] and the requirements for advertising must have been complied with.[38] Anyone filing a caveat may oppose the extension;[39] the petitioner ought to learn at the earliest possible stage the nature of objections made on the grounds of novelty or subject matter.[40] Costs are allowed on opposition to extension.[41]

For losses caused by war. In England, by virtue of an amendment to the statute,[42] the term of patents may be extended because of losses caused by war.[43] They may be extended by proceedings begun after their expiration,[44] but after a period of two[45] or three[46] years has elapsed, an exceptional case must be shown. The proceedings ordinarily are by originating summons,[47] but in an involved case, should be by petition.[48] A proceeding instituted

Second extension. There is no authority to grant a second extension,[52] even for losses caused by war.[53]

X. REISSUES

[By Rudy J. Brossman]

[§ 307] A. In General[54]—1. Definition and Nature. A reissued patent is in effect an amendment of the original patent made to cure some defect or insufficiency in the original;[55] a patent which merely secures the patent rights more definitely in some particular wherein the original patent was defective.[56] A patentee, being entitled to a reissue in case of a mistaken limitation of his claims,[57] cannot obtain relief by construction of his patent,[58] or by the issuance of another patent.[59]

[§ 308] 2. Power To Reissue and Grounds. The statutes of the United States authorize a reissue of a patent where the original is inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, or by reason of the patentee's claiming as his own invention or discovery more than he has a right to claim as new, provided the error arose by inadvertence, accident, or mistake and without any fraudulent or deceptive intent.[60] The statute is mandatory and gives the commissioner no discretion as to cases within its provisions.[61] While it is to be construed liberally according to its spirit,[62] a reissue cannot be granted except as provided therein.[63] To warrant a reissue it is necessary that there should be a bona fide mistake or accident[64] and not merely an error in judgment,[65] and the patent must be inoperative and invalid.[66] A "defective or insufficient specification" which justifies a reissue includes not only the technical specifications,[67] but the claims following them;[68] hence claims that are too narrow and render the patent inoperative justify a reissue.[69] So where the patent claims too much, there may be a reissue.[70] The reissue is not invalid because the [§ 309] 3. Persons Entitled to Reissue. A reissue may be granted to the inventor, his executor or administrator,[72] or, in case of assignment recorded in the patent office, may be granted to the assignee.[73] Joint owners must all join in a surrender for reissue or ratify a reissue, otherwise it is invalid.[74] In regard to reissues, citizens and aliens have the same rights.[75]

[§ 310] 4. Term. The reissue is granted for the unexpired part of the term of the original patent.[76]

[§ 311] B. Time for Application—1. In General. Application for reissue should be made with promptness,[77] and while the length of delay which is permissible depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[78] as a general rule, where claims are broadened, a delay of two years will ordinarily be regarded as too long unless excuse is shown therefor;[79] this rule is not applicable where the claims are not broadened,[80] and it has been said that, where the claims are narrowed, lapse of time does no more than suggest laches,[81] and does not of itself bar the

[a] Reason for rule.—"When a patentee takes out a patent, he, in effect, disclaims all that is not claimed. It is notice to the public that the claim to invention is for the elements or combination described, and for nothing more. That which is not claimed immediately becomes public property, and the public has the right to adopt and use it; hence the necessity of prompt action on the part of a patentee, since tardy reissues may conflict with intervening public rights." right to a reissue.[82]

[§ 312] 2. Intervening Rights of Third Persons. Where a reissue is sought merely to expand the claims of a patent, so as to embrace structures or devices brought into use since the issuance of the original, and which were not infringements of the claim of the original, there being no proof of mistake or inadvertence, the right to a reissue is lost by unreasonable delay, and the reissue, being made, is void.[83] What is not claimed in an original patent is dedicated to the public unless the patent is surrendered and reissued within a reasonable time and before adverse rights have accrued.[84] It will not do for the patentee to wait until other inventors have produced new forms of improvement and then, with the new light thus acquired, under pretense of inadvertence and mistake, apply for such an enlargement of his claim as to make it embrace these new forms.[85] Such a process of expansion carried on indefinitely, without regard to lapse of time, would operate most unjustly against the public and is totally unauthorized by the law.[86] No matter how valuable and meritorious an invention may be, a patentee has no right, by reissuing his patent, gradually to widen the scope of his claims so as to keep pace with the progress of invention.[87] But a reissued patent is not void because the things claimed in the original had been in public use in the interval between the original and the reissued patent. Such a publication is not an abandonment or dedication.[88] Neither is a reissue patent, obtained without unreasonable delay, void because the manufacture of an infringing device was begun before the grant of the patent.[89] Patents, applications for which were pending at the time of the issue of another patent, but which were issued later, do not of themselves raise an estoppel which will bar the right to a reissue.[90]

Structure within original patent. An infringer cannot claim an estoppel against a reissue patent as having acquired intervening rights where its structure contains all the elements of the original patent,[91] nor can he set up intervening rights where he simply copied from the original patent, knowing that the patentee had a right to a reissue.[92]

Rule where claims narrowed. The doctrine of intervening rights cannot be invoked to invalidate a reissue patent by an infringer of the device disclosed by the original patent and protected by the narrower claims of the reissue.[93] However, a reissue after long delay, during which adverse equities have arisen, cannot be sustained, when the original patent did

[a] One having actual, as distinguished from constructive, notice of an original patent is not thereby chargeable with notice of all the possibilities of reissue, so as to make unavailable in his behalf the doctrine of intervening rights of one making devices covered by the reissue, but not by the original patent. American Soda-Fountain Co. v. Swietusch, 85 Fed. 968, 29 CCA 506 [aff 75 Fed. 573].

[b] Claims affected by interference proceedings.—In re Marconi, 38 App. (D. C.) 286; In re Lacroix, 30 App. (D. C.) 299.

[c] Limitation of rule.—Where claims substantially identical with claims in plaintiff's application for reissue were embodied in its application for a second patent, of which defendant had knowledge before it conceived the idea, defendant could not be given the benefit of the conception covered by plaintiff's application, notwithstanding plaintiff had not then made his application for the reissue. Murphy Wall Bed Co. v. Pacific Spring Bed Co., 295 Fed. 745.

[a] Application as withdrawal of dedication.—The right to claim an estoppel to support a private intervening right in the nature of a license as against a generally valid reissue depends upon the dedication and its existence as a continuing offer of immunity, which the patentee withdraws by reissue application. Ashland Fire Brick Co. v. General Refractories Co., 27 F. (2d) 744.

[b] Effect of intervening patent.—The right of the public to use whatever was disclosed in an application for a patent, but not claimed, is sufficient to warrant the denial of a reissue patent containing broader claims after the lapse of two years where only the rights of applicant and the public are to be considered, notwithstanding the intervening patentees have since claimed the abandoned matter, and thereby prevented the public from enjoying the fruits of the abandonment. [a] Claim broadened in different aspect.—A narrowing limitation in a claim of a reissued patent cannot justify a broadening of the claim in a different respect when it serves to bring within the monopoly after many years a structure which otherwise would have been free. Fox not indicate, or even hint at, the invention of the reissue, even if the claim is technically narrowed instead of broadened.[94]

[§ 313] 3. Excuses for Delay. Applicant may excuse delay in applying for reissue by showing good reasons for failing to make the application sooner.[95] The question whether delay is unreasonable is a matter of law for the court.[96]

[§ 314] C. Identity of Invention[97]—1. In General. The reissued patent must be for the same invention as the original patent and no new matter can be introduced.[98] The invention may be definitely stated, but must remain the same.[99] The "same invention" as used in the reissue statute refers to

[a] Discretion of commissioners.—A determination whether the delay of more than three years after the issuance of the patent in seeking a reissue with broader claims was excusable is one largely within the discretion of the commissioner. In re Holland, 50 App. (D. C.) 268, 270 Fed. 704.

[b] Facts constituting insufficient excuse.—(1) Generally. Wollensak v. Sargent, 151 U. S. 221, 14 SCt 291, 38 L. ed. 137; Ives v. Sargent, 119 U. S. 652, 7 SCt 436, 30 L. ed. 544; Heidbrink v. (2d) 685; Parks' Application, 57 App. (D. C.) 45, 16 F. (2d) 541; In re Ams, 29 App. (D. C.) 91; In re Briede, 27 App. (D. C.) 298. (2) A showing that a delay of three and one-half years was caused by the ill health of applicant, the death of her husband, and the absence of her son in the military service, is insufficient. In re Mummert, 51 App. (D. C.) 258, 278 Fed. 399. (3) An affidavit that applicant was unskilled in patent matters and relied on his solicitor, and only recently discovered that the claims were not as broad as the invention, does not show special circumstances excusing the delay, which alone authorized a reissue of the patent with broadened claims more than two years after the original issue. In re Lees, 50 App. (D. C.) 163, 269 Fed. 679.

[c] Circumstances excusing delay.—(1) Generally. Gross v. Norris, 18 F. (2d) 418 [mod on other grounds 26 F. (2d) 898]; Worthington Pump, etc., Corp. v. Clark Bros. Co., 17 F. (2) A delay of twelve years before applying for a reissue was held not to bar a patentee by laches, where the device manufactured and sold by him was in strict conformity with that shown in his patent, and his exclusive right was acquiesced in by the trade for more than ten years, and it was only when after that serious infringement commenced that he was put upon notice that his claims were probably invalid as too broad. whatever invention was described in the original letters patent and appears to have been secured thereby;[1] the identity of the reissue with the original patent is not fixed by the claims[2] but is to be determined by the description and such other evidence as the commissioner may receive.[3] A broader claim than that in the original patent will not invalidate the reissue if it is for the same invention.[4] If not for the same invention it will.[5] Claims may be amended to include features not before claimed.[6] What may have been claimed originally may be included in the reissue.[7] Where the reissue omits several devices which were essential to the original purpose, the reissue is void.[8] The rule is otherwise, however, where the omission does not constitute an essential or material change but is only an incidental feature.[9]

[a] Any doubt that may exist as to whether a reissue is for the same invention described in the original patent should be resolved in favor of applicant, especially if it is too late to file an independent application. In re Heroult, 29 App. (D. C.) 42.

2. American Automotoneer Co. v. Porter, 232 Fed. 456, 460, 146 CCA 450.

"It is true that, for purposes of determining infringement, the identity of the patented invention is fixed by the claims; but to apply the same test to identity of invention as between original and reissue loses sight of the difference between the real invention and the originally patented invention, and unless there is such a difference, there is no occasion for reissue. To recognize that difference and permit it to be corrected is the whole purpose of the reissue statute; and so it seems quite destructive of the statute to assume that the identity of the actual invention is permanently declared and fixed by the form which the original claims are inadvertently allowed to take." issue cannot include matter which formed a part of the patentee's real invention unless that matter was actually included in the original patent.[10] A failure to include it through inadvertence, accident, or mistake does not justify its inclusion by reissue.[11] Nor, in the case of a machine patent, may the model or drawing be amended, except by each other.[12] When there is neither model nor drawing, amendments may be made upon proof satisfactory to the commissioner that such new matter or amendment was a part of the original invention, and was omitted from the specification by inadvertence, accident, or mistake.[13] It is not new matter to explain in a reissue the operation of an element shown in the original drawing and specification,[14] or to state a new use of the invention shown in the original,[15] or to vary and enlarge the description of anything inadequately described in the original.[16] Where the claims of the reissue contain new patentable matter which is so interwoven with other elements specified in the original that they cannot be separated, the entire reissued claim must be taken together, and a patent issued thereon is void.[17]

[§ 316] b. Intention To Claim. It must furthermore appear from the face of the papers that the subject matter covered by the claims of the reissue was not merely disclosed in the original patent, but was sought and intended to be claimed therein.[18] Matter intentionally omitted[19] or abandoned or disclaimed on the original application[20] cannot ordinarily be claimed on reissue. This doctrine does not apply, however, if the disclaimer was made by accident, inadvertence, or mistake.[21]

[§ 317] c. Apparatus, Process, and Product. A patent for an apparatus cannot generally be reissued to claim the process, since a process and the apparatus are not necessarily one and the same invention.[22] A process patent cannot generally be reissued to cover the apparatus.[23] There is no hard and fixed rule, however, and in some cases such a reissue may be allowed.[24] A process patent may, however, in some cases be reissued to cover the product produced by the process.[25]

[§ 318] 3. Reinsertion of Canceled Claim. The patentee cannot obtain by reissue claims inserted in the original application and canceled therefrom in view of objection or rejection by the patent office.[26]

[§ 319] D. Surrender of Original Patent. To obtain a reissue, applicant must surrender the original patent, but the surrender does not take effect until the reissue is granted, and if the reissue is refused, the original patent is in force.[27] The so-called surrender is nothing but a preliminary offer prior to the issue of the new patent;[28] the original patent is extinguished by reissue.[29] Whether, if the reissue is void, the patentee may fall back on his original patent has not been decided by the supreme court, although the question has been raised.[30] It has been held in other courts that, if the reissue is void for want of authority to make it, the surrender is ineffective for want of authority to accept it.[31] Suit cannot be maintained on the original after application for reissue and before the grant.[32]

[§ 320] E. Applications and Proceedings Thereon —1. In General. The application should put forth facts entitling the patentee to a reissue.[33] It is not indispensable that the petitioner should use the exact phraseology of the statute if he employs language which actually conveys its legal meaning.[34] Applicant must affirmatively show inadvertence, accident, or mistake,[35] and where he broadens his claims he must not only show this,[36] but that the state of the art permitted the broadened claim,[37] and that no person has acquired intervening rights.[38] A rule of the patent office requiring the petition to be accompanied by a sworn statement must be complied with in so far as the matters required to be set forth are within the power of the commissioner.[39]

The application must be signed and sworn to by the inventor if he is alive and must be acquiesced

in by assignees.[40]

The proceedings on the application are the same as in the case of original applications except that a filing fee of thirty dollars is charged and no final fee is required.[41] The application brings the whole invention before the patent office coram judice.[42]

The application may be withdrawn or abandoned at any time before the reissue is granted, and in such case the original will remain in full force.[43]

[§ 321] 2. Divisional Reissues. Several reissues may be granted for parts of the thing patented upon the payment of separate fees and other due proceedings had.[44] Several issues which in the aggregate exactly equal an originally well-drawn patent are not necessarily invalid.[45]

[§ 322] F. Reissues of Reissued Patents. A reissue may be granted of a reissued patent as well as of the original,[46] and a second reissue may return to the language of the original patent and be identical therewith.[47]

[§ 323] G. Conclusiveness and Effect of Patent Office Decisions—1. In General. The grant of a reissue by the patent office raises a presumption that the patentee was entitled to it and therefore the reissue is prima facie valid.[48] Except as to matters appearing on the face of the papers, showing excess of jurisdiction by the patent, it is conclusive.[49]

[§ 324] 2. As to Grounds for Reissue. The conclusion of the patent office officials as to inadvertence, accident, or mistake is conclusive[50] except as to matters manifest from the record.[51]

[a] Whether the application is made in reasonable time (1) is a matter of law which the court may determine by comparing the reissued patents with the original, and, if necessary, with the records in the patent office when presented for record. raises a presumption that it covers the same invention which was sought and intended to be claimed in the original, but such presumption is not conclusive;[52] the question is generally decided from the face of the papers,[53] and in such case, following general rules,[54] it is a question of law;[55] where extrinsic evidence is introduced, the question becomes one of fact.[56]

[§ 326] H. Validity, Construction, and Operation of Reissues[57]—1. Validity. Aside from the questions of new matter[58] and estoppel,[59] the validity of a reissue is determined by the same considerations as the original patent,[60] and, upon the questions of anticipation and public use and sale, relates back to the date of the original application for patent.[61] Clerical error,[62] or irregularities of procedure in matters not vital,[63] will not invalidate the reissue. One claim in a reissue may be void without necessarily invalidating the other claims,[64] and in such case it is proper to disclaim the void claim,[65] and a reissue is not invalid merely because the claim of the original patent was valid.[66] The reissue of a patent adjudged void for lack of invention is also void.[67]

Fraud. While a reissue may be impeached for fraud,[68] it cannot be attacked on that ground by defendant in a suit for infringement.[69]

[§ 327] 2. Construction and Operation[70]—a. In General. As respects the construction and operation of reissues, the same rules apply as in original pat-grounds 286 Fed. 470]; Van Kannel Revolving Door Co. v. Winton Hotel Co., 276 Fed. 234 [mod 263 Fed. 988]; Ashley v. Samuel C. Tatum Co., 240 Fed. 979; Wayne Mfg. Co. v. ents.[71] A patentee who has narrowed his claims by the insertion of a restricting clause in order to obtain any claims under a reissued patent cannot, by construction or by resorting to the doctrine of equivalents, give the claims the larger scope which they might have had without the restricting clause.[72] Original claims, retained verbatim in a reissue taken for the purpose of getting broader claims, must be given the narrow scope attributed to them by the patentee and the office, as a basis for allowing the broader reissue claims.[73]

[§ 328] b. Retroactive Operation. An infringer of the claims of a reissue can be held only for acts committed after the reissue is granted.[74] But the fact that he was using the invention before the reissue was granted does not relieve him from liability for using it subsequent to the reissue.[75] There is an apparent tendency to recognize an exception to the rule where the claims of a reissue are broadened and the infringer's device does not constitute an infringement of the original patent, the intervening rights of the infringer in such case being protected to some extent.[76]

XI. DISCLAIMERS[77]

[By Rudy J. Brossman]

[§ 329] A. In General. Whenever, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, a patentee has claimed more than that of which he was the original inventor, he, his heirs or assigns, whether of the whole or any particular interest therein, may, upon payment of the fee fixed by law, make his disclaimer of such parts of the thing patented as he shall not choose to claim or hold under the patent.[78] It must indicate the interest of disclaimant,[79] and must be in writing attested by one or more witnesses and must be recorded in the patent office.[80]

The power to disclaim is a beneficial one, and ought not to be denied, except where it is resorted to for a fraudulent and deceptive purpose.[81]

United Lace, etc., Mfg. Co., 266 Fed. 375; Grant v. Townsend, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,701; Parham v. American Buttonhole Overseaming, etc., Mach. Co., 18 F. Cas. No. 10,713, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 468.

[a] Estoppel to deny merger.—Where the holder of two patents for the same subject matter procured a reissue of the earlier one, and defendant, who infringed the second one, in nowise changed its position, such reissue did not operate to estop the holder from denying that all rights under the second patent passed and became merged in the reissued patent. Columbia Graphophone Co. v. Searchlight Horn Co., 236 Fed. 135, 149 CCA. 345.

[b] Abandonment of claims of another patent.—The holder of two patents, by an application for a reissue, based on one, was held not to abandon claims of the other, although his position involved belief of invalidity of the other. Traitel Marble Co. v. Hungerford Brass, etc., Co., 22 F. (2d) 259.

[c] Reissue of infringing patent.—Where an infringing device is constructed in accordance with a junior patent, a reissue of the junior patent, pending a suit to restrain the infringement, does not affect the suit, where no new claims are introduced by the reissue. Robbins v. Illinois Watch Co., 50 Fed. 542 [aff 52 Fed. 215, 3 CCA 42].

76. Autopiano Co. v. American Player Action Co., 222 Fed. 276, 138 CCA 38.

[a] Extent of protection.—(1) Articles which constitute an infringement on a reissue patent, but not on the original, and which were manufactured nearly two years before the reissue was granted, may be sold after reissue without liability therefor. Bull Dog Floor Clip Co. v. Munson Mfg. Co., 19 F. (2d) 43. (2) A competitor building noninfringing machines before an application for a reissue was held to have acquired the intervening right at least to continue use as if holding a license under the reissue. Ashland Fire Brick Co. v. General Refractories Co., 27 F. (2d) 744 [rev 15 F. (2d) 215].

[b] Design patent.—Where defendant had, before design patent was reissued, manufactured and sold a substantial number of articles which did not infringe complainant's original design patent, but did infringe a reissue patent, it has acquired intervening rights which prevent complainant from claiming infringement by defendant. Ashley v. Samuel C. Tatum Co., 240 Fed. 979.

The reissue[82] and disclaimer statutes, broadly speaking, have different purposes and different results.[83]

[§ 330] B. Subject Matter of Disclaimer. The separate claims of a patent may be eliminated by disclaimer,[84] but they cannot be amended and transformed into other claims,[85] and matter cannot be added to the specifications under guise of disclaimer.[86] A disclaimer may extend to a part of the specification[87] as well as to a claim[88] or one feature of a claim.[89] The practice of filing a disclaimer to cure an ambiguity is proper.[90] A disclaimer can eliminate only matter which is clearly severable from the balance,[91] and which can be removed without changing the balance.[92] Elements of a combination claim cannot be eliminated.[93] A patentee cannot, by a disclaimer, withdraw the invention which makes the structure patentable.[94]

Part of a reissued patent may be disclaimed.[95] But where a reissue is void because too broad, the original patent cannot be revived by merely filing a disclaimer of all extensions thereof.[96]

[§ 331] C. Who May Disclaim. A disclaimer may be filed by the patentee, his personal representatives or assigns.[97] Several coöwners of undivided

"The law which . . . permits [the patentee] to disclaim is not penal but remedial. It is intended for the protection of the patentee as well as the public, and ought not, therefore, to receive a construction that would restrict its operation within narrower limits than its words fairly import." [b] Appropriate office of a disclaimer (1) is to narrow a claim by confining it to what is new. Permutit Co. v. Wadham, 15 F. (2d) 20 [den reh 13 F. (2d) 454]. (2) A disclaimer is valid which only abandons something claimed in the patent, but not needed, without broadening or enlarging any claim, and leaving the claims fully supported by the original specification. [a] With claim for "means" generally, a disclaimer should be of specified means. Permutit Co. v. Wadham, 15 F. (2d) 20.

[b] Form of disclaimer.—A disclaimer of claims filed after a decision of the supreme court adjudging them invalid, which conforms to the language of the decision, is sufficient. [c] Making claim specific.—A disclaimer, making specific that which was indefinite, is valid, in the absence of fraud, provided it does not broaden the original claim and abandons what was not originally needed. American Plug Co. v. Hudson Motor Car Co., 19 F. (2d) 609.

[a] Rule applied.—(1) Where a patent covered the use of either of two materials, in the alternative, a disclaimer as to one does not change the nature of the invention, but is merely a limitation. Carson v. American Smelting, etc., Co., 4 F. (2d) 463 [rev 293 Fed. 771, and certiorari den 269 U. S. 555 mem, 46 SCt 18 mem, 70 L. ed. 409 mem]. (2) A disclaimer of an unnecessary and inadvertent statement in the specification of a patent may be entered in a suit for its infringement where its effect is not to broaden the claim in issue, but to limit it to the actual invention, strictly within the terms of the claim, and as described and shown, and to save the claim from possible ambiguity. Simplex R. Appliance Co. v. Pressed Steel Car Co., 189 Fed. 70, 110 CCA 634 [aff 177 Fed. 426, and certiorari den 223 U. S. 721 mem, 32 SCt 523 mem, 56 L. ed. 630 mem].

[a] Reason for rule.—The part which the patentee disclaims must be distinguishable on the face of the specifications to constitute a valid disclaimer; otherwise there would never be need for a reissue. Grasselli Chemical Co. v. National Aniline, etc., Co., 26 F. (2d) 305.

[a] When disclaimer of addition valid.—A disclaimer purporting to strike out everything which a reissue patent added to the patent and proceeding to narrow the original, if it can ever be upheld, will be only when there is no question that there is an invention and that the claims as modified by the disclaimer accurately define its character and its scope. interests in a patent must all join in a disclaimer.[98] But the owner of an entire interest, although limited to a certain territory, may disclaim, in which case the effect of the disclaimer will be limited to that territory.[99] Of course, the patentee cannot disclaim after he has parted with all his interest in the patent.[1]

[§ 332] D. Time for Disclaimer. Disclaimer should be filed without unreasonable delay.[2] Disclaimer may, however, be made after as well as before suit,[3] and in some cases, at least, after a decision on appeal,[4] the failure to file before suit affecting costs only,[5] and not the decree.[6] Whether a delay in filing a disclaimer is unreasonable may become a question of law.[7]

[§ 333] E. Effect of Failure To Disclaim. Where some of the claims sued on are found invalid, complainant will not be entitled to relief unless he files a disclaimer as to the claims held invalid.[8] It is not necessary to enter disclaimer except as to substantial or material parts.[9] The failure to disclaim invalid torney in the prosecution of an application does not necessarily estop the patentee from maintaining that his claim embraces the matter referred to. Mann v. Bayliss, 16 F. Cas. No. 9,034.

[a] Costs on appeal.—Failure to file, before suit for infringement is begun, disclaimer as to invalid claims of the patent in suit has no relation to costs in the circuit court of appeals. Excelsior Steel Furnace Co. v. Williamson Heater Co., 269 Fed. 614.

[b] Disclaimer by patentee without uniting assignee.—If the assignee has assigned his patent in part, and a joint suit is brought in equity for a perpetual injunction, a disclaimer by the patentee alone, without the assignee's uniting in it, will not entitle the parties to the benefit of the statute. Wyeth v. Stone, 30 F. Cas. No. 18,107, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 23, 1 Story 273.

[c] Costs will not be denied (1) where claims are abandoned on grounds other than those mentioned in the statute (Mundy v. Lidgerwood Mfg. Co., 20 Fed. 191), (2) nor where the disclaimer relates to claims not in issue (Glendale Elastic Fabric Co. v. Smith, 100 U. S. 110, 25 L. ed. 547; Stetson Hospital v. Snook-Roentgen Mfg. Co., 245 Fed. 654, 158 CCA 82; Gamewell Fire-Alarm Tel. Co. v. Municipal Signal Co., 77 Fed. 490, 23 CCA 250; American Bell Tel. Co. v. Spencer, 8 Fed. 509).

[a] Action may proceed in spite of disclaimer. Michigan Carton Co. v. Sutherland Paper Co., 29 F. (2d) 179.

[b] Disclaimer materially and substantially changing the meaning of a claim after it has been held void cannot render defendant chargeable with infringement by reason of acts done before the claim was so changed. Sutherland Paper Co. v. Michigan Carton Co., 14 F. (2d) 700.

Rich-Sampliner Co., 13 F. (2d) 132; Davey Tree Expert Co. v. Van Billiard, 255 Fed. 781, 167 CCA 125; Plecker v. Poorman, 147 Fed. 528 (all three cases supporting the view that the trial court will not require that a disclaimer be entered as a condition precedent to relief and thereby cut off the right of review).

9. Hall v. Wiles, 11 F. Cas. No. 5,954, 2 Blatchf. 194, Fish. Pat. R. 433; claims will not prevent recovery of damages for the infringement of valid claims in the patent where the patentee was not guilty of fraud and where there was no unreasonable neglect or delay in entering disclaimer.[10] Unreasonable delay, however, will be a good defense to the suit.[11]

[§ 334] F. Effect of Disclaimer. In determining the meaning of a disclaimer, the same rules are to be observed as in construing any other written instrument, the purpose being to carry out the intention of the person executing it as indicated by its language when construed with reference to the proceedings of which it forms a part.[12] A disclaimer limits the patent in so far as disclaimant is concerned to the matter therein which is not disclaimed.[13] It is effective only as to the party filing it,[14] and a disclaimer in one patent does not affect another.[15] The filing of a disclaimer is not an admission of the invalidity of the patent without it where there has been no decision by a court declaring some of the claims invalid.[16]

Review of disclaimer.[17] The appellate court is not precluded from considering the issues presented by a disclaimer because it allowed an application to be made to the trial court permitting it to be filed.[18]

XII. CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF LETTERS PATENT[19]

[By Rudy J. Brossman]

[§ 335] A. In General—1. General Rules of Construction Relating to Contracts Applicable. A patent is subject to the same general rules of construction that apply to other contracts.[20] The entire instrument, including the drawings and specifications, is to be considered in arriving at its intent and meaning.[21]

the patent laws, a patent creates a monopoly,[23] it is not such a monopoly as requires the application of a different rule.[24] However, the interests of the public in the granting of patents being paramount to those of inventors,[25] patent claims will also be interpreted in view of their contribution to the general welfare.[26] The description of the patent must be so certain as to be understood by those acquainted with the subject matter.[27] While a patent may be of doubtful meaning,[28] or contain several meanings suitable to varying expected conditions,[29] there should not be a liberality of construction which permits the inventor to couch his specification in such ambiguous terms that its claims may be expanded or contracted to suit the exigency;[30] a patent cannot have separate meanings inconsistent with each other.[31]

[§ 337] 3. Plain Meaning Not Varied. The plain and clear meaning of the terms employed cannot be varied by construction.[32] The construction must be in conformity with the self-imposed limitations which are contained in the claims.[33]

[§ 338] 4. Intention of Inventor. The intention of the parties in formulating the patent is entitled to great consideration when it can be determined from the record.[34] The court will look to the manifest

[f] Concessions as to prior art.—Unless it is unavoidable, a patent should not be given a construction that makes the patentee concede a broader and more explicit prior art than existed in fact. Pieper v. S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co., 228 Fed. 30, 142 CCA 486 [certiorari granted 239 U. S. 646 mem, 36 SCt 219 mem, 60 L. ed. 484 mem, and certiorari dism 241 U. S. 690 mem, 36 SCt 553 mem, 60 L. ed. 1237 mem].

[g] Nonessential details of construction found in the specifications and claimed in a patent should not be allowed to obscure the real invention. Société Anonyme des Anciens Etablissements Cail v. U. S., 43 Ct. Cl. 25 [aff 224 U. S. 309, 32 SCt 479, 56 L. ed. 778].

[h] Matter necessarily implied.—A claim of a patent which specifies as one of the elements of a combination a hollow piston rod is not invalid because it does not mention a piston, which is necessarily implied. Typographical errors may be disregarded. Herman v. Youngstown Car Mfg. Co., 191 Fed. 579, 112 CCA 185.

[i] There is a presumption arising from the grant of a patent that the invention covered by it differs substantially from any other covered by a prior patent. Union Special Mach. Co. v. Singer Mfg. Co., 215 Fed. 598 [rev on other grounds 227 Fed. 858, 142 CCA 382]; Seed Filter, etc., Co. v. Stocking, 172 App. Div. 726, 158 NYS 687.

[b] Use of "may."—A patentee cannot claim to occupy more room in the art than he disclosed because, instead of positive directions in the specification, the word "may" is used. Lyon v. Boh, 1 F. (2d) 48 [rev on other grounds 10 F. (2d) 30].

[c] Means described, without any addition or subtraction, must produce the desirable result which it is sought by the patent to protect. Shrauger v. Phillips Bernard Co., 247 Fed. 547.

[d] Description not void for indefiniteness.—(1) Generally. Davis-Bournonville Co. v. Alexander Milburn Co., 297 Fed. 846 [aff 1 F. (2d) 227 (certiorari granted 266 U. design in order to remove any ambiguity arising from the terms employed;[35] but this ambiguity must not be such as would perplex any ordinary mechanic in the art to which it applies.[36] Where a patent does not disclose on its face the real invention of the patentee, it cannot be aided by parol testimony.[37]

[§ 339] 5. Contemporaneous Construction of Inventor. The contemporaneous construction put by the patentee upon his own invention is entitled to consideration, but cannot control the plain terms of the patent.[38]

[§ 340] 6. Meaning of Words. Words and phrases used in the patent will be given their ordinary meaning in the absence of anything to show that they are used in a different sense.[39] But their meaning may vary with the context[40] and with the circumstances.[41] Terms should be given a reasonable, and not a technically exact, meaning.[42] It is sometimes necessary to resort to the prior art to ascertain the meaning of an expression.[43]

A patentee may define his own terms, regardless of common or technical meaning, and his definition should be accepted in construing the patent.[44] However, such definition must be ascertained from the use of the words in the specification and claims,[45] and must be in harmony with the asserted advance which the invention represents over the prior art.[46]

Technical terms will be given the meaning in which they would be understood by those skilled in the art.[47]

Particular words and phrases. Many words and phrases as employed in patents have been judicially construed,[48] as for example, "attached;"[49] "auto-

[§ 341] 7. Proceedings in Patent Office.[89] The proceedings in the patent office pending an application are not as a general rule admissible as evidence tending to enlarge, diminish, or vary the language of the claim of the patent.[90] Any correspondence between the inventor and the patent office prior to the grant of the patent is inadmissible to enlarge, diminish, or vary the language of the patent afterward issued,[91] at least where its terms are not ambiguous.[92] But the file wrapper may be used to interpret the language of a patent, when susceptible of different legitimate meaning,[93] and to determine whether an estoppel has arisen.[94] Arguments made by applicant in the patent office are not to be taken as the measure of his patent, where not accompanied by any changes in claims;[95] and do not estop the patentee from claiming what is clearly granted by the patent.[96] When the patent bears on its face a particular construction, such a construction may be
